

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

THE TRANSLATOR.

ANXIOUS as I have been to render my translation of the present work a faithful reproduction of the original, I must apologise for the literal rendering of many phrases which have no equivalent in English and indeed are no longer used in French.

Baron de Hübner has applied himself so diligently to the task of removing the veil by which the true character of Pope Sixtus V. had been obscured by contemporary historians, that his quotations have been necessarily multiplied to a degree which he could not at first have anticipated.

Many of the quotations are themselves translations from the Spanish, Italian, and Latin languages; while many expressions in the correspondence of French diplomatists of the period are either no longer in use, or have lost the sense in which they were then employed.

There is a quaintness, however, about them which I would gladly have rendered in all instances had it been in my power; but, on reading my translation over, I am almost sorry that I have kept to the literal sense, lest what was witty, and even sarcastic, in the original may in my version provoke only a contemptuous smile.

The fear of robbing the sayings of such men as Cardinal d'Este, the ambassador Pisany, and the correspondence of the Venetian envoys of their quaintness has nevertheless withheld me from offering the pith instead of a complete translation of their communications, and I must crave indulgence for those passages which may surprise an English ear unaccustomed to the eccentricities of foreign and old French styles.

PART THE FIRST.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION.

THE LIFE and PONTIFICATE of SIXTUS THE FIFTH have often been written. Each of the three centuries which separate us from that great Pope has seen many works appear in memory of his deeds. Of the several authors who have written about him, three have done their utmost—the one to falsify truth, the other to find it, and the third to propagate it. Their names are Leti, Tempesti, and Ranke.

The work of Gregorio Leti—full of silly tales, of contradictory statements, and of palpable falsehoods—does not reflect either wit or style, and was published for the first time at Lausanne in 1669. It was reprinted several times, and translated into many languages. The enormous success which it obtained in its day can only be explained by the very great interest then attached to the still recent memory of Sixtus, and by the ever-powerful attraction which scandal and the condemnation of the work in Catholic countries obtained for it. Another cause of success was the popular form which Leti gave to his book, in order to flatter the taste of his readers, by making Pope Sixtus a kind of Quixotic hero of romance.

This style of literature, which was invented in Spain, as everyone knows, had already then crossed the Pyrenees and gained favour with the public of Europe. It maintained itself in favour during the remainder of the seventeenth century, and reached its zenith in France under the pen of the author of 'Gil Blas,' when it crossed the Channel and merged into the school of the English novelists. We should insult the old Castilian writers of romance, as well as Le Sage, Fielding, and Smollett, were we to associate with their names that of Gregorio Leti, who is unworthy of being in such noble company. While their works have immortalised them, and do not cease to be read, Leti and his writings have long since been deservedly forgotten. The caricatured and bad portrait which he drew of Sixtus V. has unfortunately survived the memory both of himself and of his book. While oral traditions grew fainter, without however wholly disappearing,¹ the ridiculous mask portrayed by the seventeenth-century historian was everywhere accepted as true to and like the original. The more educated portion of the public mistook a book of fiction wherein what is true and false is mixed up, but where what is false predominates, for a book of history, and Sixtus V. passed to posterity under an ignoble disguise. A pig-driver as a child, later a giddy and youthful monk, then a restless, insupportable, and ambitious subordinate—a facetious talker—a fanatical inquisitor, an hypocritical cardinal, who threw away his crutches as soon as he had secured his election by a vulgar artifice—a tyrannical Pope—the friend of the King of Navarre, at that time chief of the Huguenots, dreaming only of waging war against Philip II., the most powerful sovereign of Christendom, and his principal supporter, and finally poisoned by the King whose suspicious nature he had contrived to rouse,—such is the Sixtus of Gregorio Leti, such as he has been depicted over and over again, such as he has appeared in all historical summaries, such as the youth have been taught to look upon him, and such as he has been endlessly represented in painting and in sculpture.

A hundred years after Leti, Padre Tempesti of the order of the Conventualists, to which Sixtus had belonged, undertook to redress the wrong done to that Pope's memory.¹ The book is the work of a monk who claims for his order one of the glories of the Papal succession. It constitutes as conscientious a panegyric as a panegyric can be, and being based upon contemporary manuscripts, upon many official documents of an authenticity which cannot be contested, but also upon others which lack it altogether, may be considered as a valuable collection of materials for the use rather of the learned than of the general public. Being little known, the learned monk's book failed to obtain its end in its failure to secure many readers. Close upon a century more had elapsed when Leopold von Ranke, enlightened by Padre Tempesti, and making use of new information, had the honour of being the first person who understood and portrayed in a masterly manner, and with a much nearer approach to the truth, though in very few pages, the characteristics of the great Pontiff. Thanks to the German historian, light began to dawn, although not as yet completely. Several essential phases of his remarkable existence, such as the transactions relative to the affairs of France, and in general the nature of the relations between the Courts of Rome and Madrid, which are so important in the appreciation of the character of Sixtus V., have remained in the dark.

At the time when Ranke wrote his 'History of the Popes' of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the archives of Simancas, which contained the correspondence of the Spanish ambassadors, were not yet thrown open to the literary world. In these archives are to be found the reports made to Philip II. by Count Olivarès, his ambassador ordinary at the Court of Rome; by the Duke de Sessa, his representative in the Holy City; by Don Bernardino of Mendoza, his ambassador in France; together with the King's instructions, drawn up by the Secretary of State, Ydiaquez, and corrected and augmented by the King himself.

Sixtus V. was his own Minister for Foreign Affairs. He was wont to transact business personally and vivâ voce with foreign ambassadors. The despatches and instructions addressed to the several Nuncios which exist at the Vatican are few in number, and often refer to verbal instructions or to remarks made by travellers. In all these documents, drawn up either by himself or by a congregation of cardinals, and always signed by Cardinal Montalto, his grand-nephew,¹ Sixtus V. shows himself such as he wished to appear. In the reports of the ambassadors which gave accounts of their interviews with the Pope, and related their impressions of the moment, Sixtus is represented as he appeared to their mostly just and discerning glance, though passion might at times blind their judgment. They were ever anxious to sound his inmost thoughts, and there to look for the truth. His secret relations with the Court of Spain, which have hitherto been very imperfectly known, relate to matters of the highest interest, and to questions of the most vital importance in his times and reign. Hence the importance of the archives preserved at Simancas.

The ambassadors of Spain, in the opinion of the Romans, held, to use a modern expression, the first place among the members of the Corps Diplomatique. The representatives of Philip exercised most influence, and enjoyed the highest authority at Court and with the Sacred College, but their Venetian colleagues possessed the confidence and friendship of Sixtus V. Both the one and the other were remarkable for their statesmanlike powers of appreciation and their experience, engaged as they constantly were in the transaction of the most important and complicated business. This is easily conceived when it is remembered that the sun never set within the boundaries of the Spanish king's realm, and that the Republic of Venice, thanks to its exceptional position at Constantinople, often served as an intermediary between the Porte and the seat of Christianity. Charles V.'s monarchy, mixed up as it was with all the quarrels which troubled the world and itself, made up of so many conflicting elements, had required, on the part of that prince, and, indeed, had developed in him, a greater talent for negotiation than for administration. The fate of the Republic of St. Mark, placed as it was between the two branches of the House of Hapsburg, between France and the Sultan, depended henceforth, as indeed the issue of the League of Cambrai had shown it, far less upon its military and maritime resources, which were allowed to be insufficient against a coalition of European Powers, than upon the wisdom of its rulers and the ability of its diplomatists. It is in the itinerary cabinet of Charles V. and in the midst of the 'most excellent' college of Venice that analogous wants gave birth to modern diplomacy, and that the art of negotiating and thus of supporting the interests of the State without having recourse to the uncertainty of arms for their safeguard, took the form, and adopted the rules and usages, which govern it even to this day.

King Philip II. required detailed and continuous reports from his agents abroad. He was wont to read these with the most scrupulous attention, and often made remarks upon them in his own illegible handwriting. These important historical marginal notes, which it is so difficult to decipher, often shed floods of light upon the inmost thoughts of that prince, on his bent of mind, and on the ultimate aim of his politics. Nothing escaped him in this equally broad and narrow minded, deep and minute examination. Accessories, insignificant details, often arrested his attention and absorbed his thoughts. Thus, for instance, on one occasion he was told that Sixtus V., in a late allocution, had recalled a precedent of Henry VII. of England. Philip at once discovered the Pope's error, who mistook Henry VII. for Henry II., and in giving the report to his secretary of state, wrote in the margin : 'I do not think it is Henry VII., but a former sovereign. You will let me know.'¹ The drafts of his answers, corrected and revised by himself, were often altogether altered and transformed before being written out for his signature and sent to his ambassadors. Hence the care with which the latter used to draw up their correspondence ; not as regards style, which was too often diffuse, careless, and even obscure, but so far as it was their duty to keep their master well informed of the progress of the negotiations with which they were entrusted.

They were men of business as well as statesmen, faithful, zealous, and often ardent executors of the sovereign's will, fearless of giving their opinion and of advising the King, who in his reply was not above explaining his motives for either accepting or declining to follow their advice. Deferential according to the customs of the times, but never obsequious, ever full of that Spanish sosiego which never left them even in the presence of the King, they variously appeared in their relations with foreign sovereigns and ministers to be insinuating or domineering, irascible, using corruption without any sense of shame, or threats without any degree of fear; nor were they ever unmindful of the greatness of the Spanish Power, which, although already on its decline, was still the first Power in the world. In people so highly situated at Court and in the State, one can easily perceive, through the eccentricities of official style, both the character of the man and of the statesman—the proud Castilian, who from an hidalgo became a grandee of Spain, who remembered still too vividly the feudal independence of his forefathers to be completely transformed as yet into the obsequious courtier which after one or two generations his heir was destined to be—the high functionary of state, the confidant of the King, whose experience in public affairs had obtained for him the mastery over all its intricacies, who knew how difficult, nay, how dangerous, it might be to replace him, who was therefore penetrated with his own importance, and yet foreshadowed the looming bureaucrats of the future.

The writings of Philip's diplomatic agents reflect the last traditions of the Middle Ages, of an era which was already past, and the first tokens of modern civilisation just beginning to spread throughout the world. In these writings can be traced the contact of the two eras which are about to part for ever.

The difficulties and delays in communication with Spain, across a sea infested with pirates, or across France, which was the seat of the battles of the League, account for the great discretion allowed to the ambassadors. Of this discretionary power they made ample use. Not scrupulous in the selection of their means, they were aware that the essential point was to succeed, that their master was too far away to control their actions at every moment, and that in any case they had time to change their line of conduct if necessary, and thus avoid a possible disgrace. On the other hand, the King, slow in making up his mind, and still slower in acting up to his determination when once fixed upon, was buried in his papers, which even in his relations with his ministers he made use of instead of words, thus establishing the germs of that bureaucracy which, while born in his reign and in the silence of the Escorial and of the Prado, was destined to invade the chanceries of every nation, as the Spanish etiquette was already beginning to invade all the Continental courts. He treated his ambassadors with all the consideration due to their exalted position, and to the magnitude of the interests confided to their care. He felt that while honouring them he was honouring himself, and that nothing is so disparaging to the authority of a sovereign as the denials he may give to the proceedings of his representatives. While they served him, he entirely trusted them, which is another great quality in a king. He instructed them with great care, entered fully into questions, foresaw every contingency, never neglected to recommend prudence and moderation as well as frequent and detailed reports of proceedings ; and he did all this in a simple, good-natured manner, which, while it showed by its tone that he was the master, spared the susceptibilities and endeavoured to animate, while it repressed, the zeal of his agents.

It was customary at Venice for the text of the instructions and despatches, which for that reason are called deliberations (deliberazioni) to be discussed in the Senate. At the end of the drafts of such despatches, the drawing up of which was agreed to by a formal vote, it was usual to inscribe the result of the votes for and against, as also the number of abstentions. This process often gave rise to indiscretions, and was much objected to by diplomatists. Both Sixtus V. and Philip II. were occasionally wont to amuse themselves by letting the representatives of the Republic see how well-informed they were.¹ Ambassadors accredited to the Republic treated all matters before the Senate, or in the Doge's apartment in presence of all his secretaries, for he never saw them alone. The results of these conversations were consigned in reports of the proceedings known as esposizioni. The agents of the Republic addressed their reports (dispacci) to the most serene prince, the Doge, who opened them and read them to the Senate. Hence the habit of offering a premium to those messengers who reached Venice before the hour of meeting of the Senate ; a custom which, adopted later by the diplomatic chanceries of other countries, has been continued down to a recent time in the shape of the gañadoras of the Spanish messengers. The reports called dispacci are mostly masterpieces which our young diplomatists would do well to study and emulate. All the gifts which Providence alone can give or deny at will, such as wisdom, elevation of ideas, greatness of views, and foresight, as well as the results of experience in the shape of patience, coolness, and a knowledge of the human heart, are noticeable in these despatches. Add to them great dignity, coupled with considerable suppleness, a worship for truth, a noble frankness which does not dread to offend those in power, and which constitutes so rare though so necessary a virtue when the interests of one's country, and not one's own personal interests, are at stake; all those qualities, in fact, which make the Statesman are visible in every page of those despatches which centuries have yellowed, but which seem to have been written only yesterday in a simple, correct, and earnest language, though not in so elegant a style as the classical and pure diction of the public men of Tuscany. On their return to Venice, ambassadors were compelled, in virtue of a law which was decreed towards the end of the thirteenth century, to read before the Senate a memorandum of the events which had occurred during their missions abroad and of the part they had taken in them. Such are the relazioni, which being published for the most part have proclaimed the genuine worth of the Venetian diplomacy. These accounts, however, though undoubtedly valuable as historical documents of that time, imply certain reservations which their being drawn up after the events had occurred easily accounts for, and lack the interest of complete historical narratives. As compared with the dispacci they are only second in interest. Finally the Doge's secretaries, when sending off the despatches, used to annex flying leaves, giving a summary of the latest news which was for ever flowing from every part of the globe, and especially from the Levant, into that great centre of politics and commerce. It created an excellent opportunity for ambassadors to satisfy the curiosity of sovereigns who were ever anxious to hear fresh news, to make themselves welcomed, and to increase their opportunities of obtaining an audience. The advices (avvisi) from Venice, which contained the small chronicles of the day, were highly appreciated in Prague, where the correspondence of the House of Fugger at Augsburg vied with that of the ambassadors, and not less so in Paris, in London, in Rome, and in Madrid. Philip II. used to say that no court in Europe was so well-informed as that of the Doge. The avvisi have unfortunately not been preserved in the Venetian archives, because, bearing no official stamp, no drafts were kept of them. They are to be found dispersed here and there in various libraries.

The Emperor Rodolph II., preoccupied as he was with German questions, with the affairs of Poland, with the anxieties which the Sultan was ever causing him, with the incipient disputes in his own family, could devote but little attention to the affairs of Italy. He on most occasions referred to Philip II., not, however, without experiencing a certain degree of jealousy at the preponderant influence which the head of the Spanish branch of his house exercised in the Peninsula. Baron Madruccio, who was his ambassador in Rome, and enjoyed a great reputation, but who was then infirm and approaching his end, was assisted by his brother, the great Cardinal of Trent, who, owing to other occupations, wrote but seldom and left but few traces of his writings in the archives of Vienna.

Cardinal d'Este, protector of France, brother of the Duke of Ferrara, a partisan of the House of Valois both on account of his blood connections and of his gratitude, together with M. de Saint-Gouard, better known later under the title which he assumed of Marquis de Pisany, were invested with the full powers of Henry III. After the death of Cardinal d'Este, Cardinal de Joyeuse succeeded to the protectorate. His letters,¹ thanks to his witty secretary, the Abbé d'Orsat, who was afterwards made a cardinal, are well known. The correspondence of these men, together with the despatches of M. de Villeroy, which he used to write in his own name or in the shape of letters from the King, the drafts² of which are all in his own handwriting, bear too individual a stamp to authorise the historian to form his judgment upon French diplomacy at that time. The chiefs of the League, the princes of the blood, the King of Navarre, each had in Rome several agents. Their correspondence, of which several important fragments have been preserved, prove how active, how intelligent, they were, and how great at times their influence must have been at the Vatican.

Among the Italian princes no one took more pains to be well with Rome than the Grand-Duke of Tuscany. Neither his brother, the Cardinal de' Medici, nor his ambassadors lost an opportunity of writing to him by every courier, and he remained himself in active correspondence with his auditore de rota and some unacknowledged agents who, like Monsignor Sangaletto, held places of confidence about the person of the Pope. Tuscan diplomacy was no longer what it was in the times of Machiavelli. The Republic of Florence, though a first Power in the fifteenth century, and erected into a grand-duchy since, no longer boasted that relative importance which it had possessed in the days before its destinies were handed over to foreign States. As the States of Italy ceased to be free and independent, so did the influence of Tuscany diminish, and the sphere of action of its political men proportionately decrease. This is felt in the Grand-Duke's correspondence, which nevertheless constitutes one of the most fertile sources of information in the study of the life and of the Court of Sixtus V. His letters are remarkable for their exquisite taste, their great clearness, and especially for a charm and purity of style worthy of the cradle of modern arts and literature.

The Dukes of Savoy, Mantua, Parma, Ferrara, and Urbino kept up intimate relations through their agents at Rome with the cardinals and most influential residents.

The Pope's Nuncios were chosen among the Italian bishops, and only when they had attained the rank of legate in the Sacred College. We owe much valuable information to the reports of Cardinals Morosini and Gaetani, both legates in France, which are deposited in the secret archives of the Vatican. This correspondence completes and controls while it confirms that of the foreign ambassadors accredited to the Court of the Vatican.

Nothing is more worthy of credence than the reports of diplomatic agents, who are bound, by the duties of their position as well as in their own interest, to render a faithful account of events which come under their observation, and of the conversations which they hold with people with whom they are called upon to treat. In voluntarily sinning against truth, a diplomatist would not only fail in the performance of his first duty, but would expose himself, sooner or later and in all probability immediately, to the discovery of his fault, and hence to certain ruin. He is aware that his Government is constantly informed, through the agent of the Court to which he is himself accredited, of all the steps of the negotiations entrusted to his care. He cannot ignore that the other members of the diplomatic body, at least the principal or best-informed among them, who attach great importance to following out from afar negotiations in which they do not themselves take a part, often penetrate its secret purpose and hasten to acquaint their own Courts. Hence the double control of the diplomatist's correspondence with the Cabinet with which he is negotiating, and of the echoes of other Courts foreign to the negotiation ; a control which of itself would keep him within the bounds of truth, were he not upheld by a sense of duty and of honour. It is, however, one thing to give facts as they have occurred and to reproduce conversations almost textually, but another to appreciate the character of men and to judge them. In this respect each man is supposed to follow the dictates of his reason and of his conscience ; but men are easily influenced by interested motives, or led astray by the bad counsels of passion. This explains why, while the accounts which diplomats give of occurrences are trustworthy, their appreciation of them is not equally so. Thus, in comparing the reports of the ambassadors of Spain, of France, of Venice, who pleaded before Sixtus V. interests widely differing in nature, and often carried on a warfare against one another, either secretly or openly, we cannot fail to be struck, not so much with the great difference of appreciation—a fact not to be wondered at—as with the perfect harmony which exists in their accounts of the same facts and of the same transactions. The moment they touch upon facts, all prejudices disappear, all passions are allayed, and they devote themselves wholly to the task of telling the truth.

These precious documents, inasmuch as they refer to the political action of Sixtus V. and to the several branches of administration of his government, except criminal justice, give but small information respecting his antecedents, the obscure existence of Frà Felice, and the forced retreat of Cardinal Montalto. All the details given in Tempesti's work are borrowed from anonymous manuscripts in the 'Capitol' at Vallicellana, and in the archives of Prince Allieri. They were examined and criticised by Ranke, and contain, in spite of many errors, much that is interesting and apparently true. We shall only make use of these occasionally, and only when we can bring official documents to bear upon their truth. We had rather deprive the reader of some curious or amusing information, be it true or not, than deprive our work of the merit of being based upon official documents of genuine authenticity. Another point, still more interesting in the historian's eyes than the antecedents of Sixtus V.—his administration of criminal justice,—is to the same slight extent elucidated in the diplomatic correspondence. Ambassadors mention some of the most celebrated causes, sometimes blaming, at others approving, his proceedings, but in general speaking favourably of them, though they allow that his régime was somewhat severe. Their information and their criticisms will naturally find a place in our book. All that we have read in the numerous manuscripts which bear a subsequent date to this pontificate is marked with exaggeration and untruth. Such accounts we decline to notice. It is certainly an unfortunate void, but a void is better than a fiction. In order that a correct opinion may be formed of the criminal justice administered by Sixtus V., we should have before our eyes the original of those legal documents of procedure which have disappeared, or which, at least, we have been wholly unable to discover. The greatest portion, however, of these annals, which have been many times reproduced, only date from the second half and from the end of the seventeenth century. At this time there existed in Rome and in Venice manufacturers of manuscripts, which constituted the only political reading in which the higher classes could indulge. The work of Leti, which was published, as we have already stated, at Lausanne in 1669, and the circulation of which was rigorously prohibited in Italy, where it had met with great success, naturally made Sixtus V. a subject of predilection with the news-mongers. They were often wont to do nothing but copy passages from Leti's book. The documents which they produced are apocryphal,¹ and the facts which they alleged either altogether falsified or grossly altered. They have no notion either of the men or the events of the day, and completely ignore circumstances which must have been known to all their contemporaries. Yet, with the exception of Ranke, all the biographers of Pope Sixtus have allowed themselves to be guided by these manuscripts.²

² According to the unanimous opinion of people well versed in such matters, and in particular of the eminent P. Theiner, prefect of the secret archives of the Vatican, not one of the MSS. to which we have just referred dates further back than the second half of the seventeenth century, most of them belonging to the latter part of that era. The quality of the paper, the character of the writing, the language and the style would all seem to confirm the fact, were it not plain from the accounts themselves and from the complete ignorance which their authors show of the times they treat of, that such is the case. Here are some instances which will satisfy the reader. Sixtus V. is meditating a war with Spain for the purpose of conquering Naples. He tells Olivares that that king-

We will not follow such an example.

It is with the help of the diplomatic correspondence of those times that we have undertaken to write the dom belongs to the Holy See. Olivarès insists on the Pope giving him proofs of this fact. Sixtus sends to Fort St. Angelo for a paper which establishes the rights of the Church. Olivarès asks to be allowed to read the document at his leisure, which permission is granted to him on the condition that he shall bring it back at his next audience. Olivarès takes the paper with him and takes care that it shall not be returned. What is to be done? The Pope would like to imprison the Ambassador; but the Governor of Rome suggests a better means of recovering the stolen talisman. He requests an autograph order of the Pope, authorising him to cut the Ambassador's head off in front of the palace which he inhabits opposite the Anina, a place where Olivarès never resided, his embassy being situated in the Corso, at the palace of Urbinum, now called the Palazzo Doria, where it stood for many years, the fact being known by every child in Rome, but conveniently forgotten a hundred years later, at the time when these stories were fabricated. The Governor's notion pleases the Pope. Monsignor Pierbenedetti, followed by the borgello and by several executioners, causes the scaffold to be erected on the Piazza Navone, and the Ambassador's house to be surrounded by soldiers, steps up to Olivarès' room, summons him to give back the document, which the Ambassador, trembling for his life, hastily does, and in return for this act the Governor is made a cardinal.

Young Ranuccio Farnese has an audience of the Pope, but unfortunately as he is kneeling before His Holiness, a pistol falls from his pocket. It being prohibited under penalty of death to carry fire-arms, Farnese is taken to St. Angelo and ordered to be executed at midnight. Happily for him his uncle the Cardinal is a man of expedients. He causes all the clocks in Rome to be stopped, and his nephew is saved. The Pope, furious at such conduct, obliges the Cardinal at the next public Consistory to kneel, and to repeat a 'pater,' an 'ave,' and a 'credo' while kneeling with his arms stretched in the form of a cross. 'It is a priest,' said Sixtus V., 'who has deceived a monk, and it is a monk's penance I have inflicted upon you; next time I shall punish you as a Pope should.' The stories of Sixtus V. wishing to kill the hereditary prince of Parma, son of Prince Alexander, nephew of Philip II., commanding the army of the latter in Flanders (whom he wanted to marry to one of his grand-nieces), whom he had every reason not to thwart, and whom he so far dreaded to offend (as will be seen hereafter) that he actually risked a feud with the Emperor!—and of the penances imposed by the Pope on Cardinal Farnese, are so many anecdotes which bear the print of vulgar ignorance, and resemble those popular tales which are generally sold at country fairs. Yet, notwithstanding their absurdity, eminent authors have actually reproduced them. The story of history of Sixtus V. These documents are the reports drawn up by the nuncios, by the ambassadors, of the Emperor, of Spain, of France, of Tuscany, and of Venice—the instructions received from their Governments—the autograph letters of the Pope, of Philip II., of Henry III., of the cardinals, envoys to the great Powers, and of the agents of the League. These official documents, which are almost unknown as yet, are perfectly authentic, for they have been copied under our superintendence from the originals in the State archives of the Vatican, of Vienna, of Paris, Simancas, Venice, and Florence.¹

The Venetian ‘advices,’ the flying sheets of the Roman newswriters, which also were styled avvisi—the parish registers of the Holy City—a few forgotten publications of those times, will furnish us with information not as regards the history of facts, but with respect to the customs, and the social constitution of Italy and Rome at that period.

The judgment which contemporaries pass upon themselves and the events of their times are undoubtedly of great historical value. We are often too prone to judge of the past by the light of our own generation. To be fair and just, we should place ourselves on their own level, and to obtain this end, we should listen to them. We shall therefore take great pains in collecting their opinions. With the help of such documents as we already possess, we shall penetrate into the intimacy of those princes, ministers, and favourites, statesmen and others who have played an important part, and have contributed to the history which we are endeavouring to write. While occasionally expressing an idea of our own, as it is the undoubted right and duty of an historian to do, we shall bear in mind the dominant ideas, the manners and customs, prejudices and aspirations, of the period. Good and evil undoubtedly remain what they are; but our notions of either are constantly changing within certain limits. Each century has qualities and faults peculiar to itself, its bright and dark sides, its heroes and its monsters, its martyrs and its dupes. Those who can resist temptation, and who can keep free from the stains of their epoch, naturally call for our admiration. But these form the exception; the majority, struck by the evil, follow the current. The weak, it appears to us, have claims to our indulgence, and should be allowed to plead extenuating circumstances before the tribunal of history.

Ranuccio is to be found in several works, and amongst others in Monroni's Historical Dictionary, published at Venice in 1842, vol. xv. p. 201. How then can we add faith to the history of the criminal suits told in these manuscripts?

What would now-a-days be said of a Government which would allow a man's life to be taken without having him previously tried? It would be universally condemned, or rather such a contingency is no longer possible. It was not always so. Even in the time of the Guises, the sovereign was looked upon as the supreme judge, who, it is true, had bequeathed his rights to competent tribunals, but who could dispense with their aid whenever the public safety or that of his own person seemed to require it.

In the sixteenth century, public offices were sold by the Treasury, and the buyer got back his capital and the interest of his purchase-money by levying a tax upon those who had recourse to him in the exercise of his special functions. In the present day, on the contrary, the expenses of the several departments of the State are covered by duties levied upon the whole of the nation, and it is through the medium of the several departmental treasuries, and not from hand to hand, that the public functionary now receives the salary due to his efforts.

It is clear, then, that what would now deeply affect our sense of justice, such as murder, our sense of delicacy, such as venality, neither astonished nor shocked anyone in those days, because such acts were in accordance with public right, the organisation of the State, and the customs of the day.¹

Finally, it is by gathering our information from authentic sources, and principally from diplomatic reports perfectly trustworthy as to facts, as well as by attaching great importance to the judgments of contemporary writers, that we have gone on with this study, which is the fruit of a long research, having for its sole aim to arrive at the truth as regards Sixtus V. and to proclaim it.

Free from all thought of the present, we will bestow our whole attention on the past; for it is an historical work, and not a casual story which we intend to publish.

CHAPTER II.

STATE OF EUROPE AT THE TIME OF THE ELECTION OF SIXTUS V.

GREGORY XIII. died on April 10, 1585. If, at that moment, some writer at his Court had undertaken to give us a picture of the state of Europe at that time, France and Spain would have occupied the most prominent positions. France was then a prey to the horrors of a civil war, under the shaken authority of Henry III. Spain was still under the rule of the son of Charles V. Older every day and infirm, but yet active in his own manner, Philip II. was still waging a successful war against Flanders, helping in an underhand way the disturbances by which France was the sufferer, and ruling over Italy, where he possessed the Milanese, Naples, Sicily, Sardinia, and the outposts of the Maremma. Harassed by English filibusters, the most audacious of whom, Drake, was soon to disturb his peace of mind, seeing that the English flag of Elizabeth protected his rebellious subjects in the Low Countries, Philip already meditated the conquest of England as a remedy against the evil at home.

In Germany, Rodolph II. was entirely taken up by the affairs of the Empire which were not yet settled, and by the precarious state of his hereditary possessions, which were being slowly undermined. The Sultan, who was at war with Persia, allowed Europe to breathe a little more freely. Poland, the seat of events of momentous importance, and dear to the Popes on account of the Catholic interests there at stake, almost escaped their tender attention, owing to its distance from Rome; and the well-nigh imaginary country of the Moscovites or Russians, whose schism was deplored in Rome, was scarcely better known than China and certainly less than Japan.

A writer of that epoch would have devoted many pages to the Queen of England and to the King of Navarre, whose names are for ever recurring in the letters and memoirs of that time. Henry of Navarre (called the Bearnais at the Court of Spain, for since the annexation to Spain of the Navarrese provinces situated on the southern slope of the Pyrenees, Philip considered himself as the legitimate sovereign of all the lands which the son of Jeanne d'Albret had been able to keep) had already become a popular personage. His turn of mind, his friendly and chivalrous ways, his bravery, his really French good humour, and even his touch of gallantry, earned for him the favour of the general public. Even at the Court of Gregory XIII., which was entirely devoted to Spain, there existed a great disposition to forgive him, because it was hoped that he would recant. Queen Elizabeth also enjoyed great consideration. The terror which her name inspired made up for the charm which constituted Henry's good fortune. Rome, ill-disposed to put up with the protection of Philip II., with which, however, she could not dispense, followed intently, and not without a certain amount of pleasure, the movements of that bold, intelligent, and proud woman, who could be coldly passionate whenever she thought it necessary, who had succeeded in strengthening her tottering throne, and had ventured to excite the hatred, nay, what was still more dangerous, to awaken the apprehension, of the most powerful sovereign in Europe. The unfortunate Mary Stuart was still confined in her prison at Fotheringay. Her death had not yet determined the rupture between the English queen and the Catholic world, though (strange and significative of the manners of the day) Elizabeth's cruel proceedings neither forfeited for her the allegiance of her subjects nor the admiration of Europe. She and Henry of Navarre, who were at that time the stanchest supporters of the new doctrines, and were both excommunicated, were both, notwithstanding, treated with regard at Rome, it being always hoped that they would return to the Church, and that then the triumph of the Catholic Faith in England, from which country it had been altogether expelled, and in France, where a similar result was apprehended, would be secured.

CHAPTER III.

RELATIONS OF THE POPE WITH THE STATES OF EUROPE.

THE Pope, as head of the Church, whose interests were mixed up with those of the State, religious and civil laws still everywhere running into one another; the Venetian Republic, still powerful, though gradually falling from the high position which she had formerly occupied among nations; the Duke of Savoy, as master of the Alps; all three, Pope, Doge, and Duke, were, in Italy, forcibly mixed up in all the questions which then interested Europe. Venice and Savoy were essentially European Powers.

The Republic of the Doge had no longer any other wish than to maintain whatever influence and territory she possessed, as well as to insure for her commerce with the Levant that monopoly which, by the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope, was about to be wrested from her. From a restless and ambitious policy, she had come down to one most pacific and conservative in character. Thanks to a correct appreciation of her position, which was daily becoming more exceptional and hence more compromised, Venice already sought the guarantees of her existence in that balance of power between the great States and in the European equilibrium which was soon to be established in principle and to become one of the bases of modern society.

The hope, or rather the illusion, of some day re-establishing the supremacy of the Pope on its former footing had not yet been altogether abandoned by some personages in Rome. In Madrid, Philip II., less by a desire of conquest than by a natural wish to strengthen his monarchy by bringing together its scattered members, encouraged that dream of a universal monarchy which was so near being realised by his father. No sooner had Henry of Navarre ascended the throne of France than his views took a similar line, until he had formed the grand project of humbling the House of Austria, of scattering its powers for the benefit of all, as he was wont to say, but in reality for the sole benefit of France, and thus of becoming the arbiter of the world's destinies.¹ These several ambitious schemes, which, could they have been realised, would have proved to be exactly alike, would not have failed to seek a justification in the old theory of the Christian world as understood in the Middle Ages, namely, the sublime doctrine, never wholly realised, of the mystic union of the Church and the State, each represented by a chief—the Pope and the Emperor—who in dividing between them the exercise of supreme power, guarantee and embrace the whole range of human interests. A river, however, can never be brought back to the source from which it springs.

Those times were gone, never to return, and with them those notions had disappeared which had characterised them. The universal monarchy of Charlemagne had no more chances of revival, except indeed momentarily and on the condition of meeting with insurmountable obstacles, than had such reigns as those of Popes Gregory VII. and Innocent III.

Situated as she was in constant and direct communication with both branches of the House of Austria, the Republic of St. Mark, which was for ever experiencing the influence of Philip at Rome and in all the important towns of the Peninsula, took the utmost care not to get into trouble either with the Emperor, the King of Spain, or with the Pope. Meanwhile, however, she leaned towards those States which, by their silent or open hostility to the Hapsburgs, appeared to her ipso facto to be her natural allies. These were France and England,—Henry III., and after him the King of Navarre, then at the head of the Huguenots, but who, as people already felt in Venice, was likely to inherit the Valois throne, and Elizabeth, the heretical Queen, who, like Henry, was separated from the Communion of the Church of Rome. This position was all the more difficult, the more delicate, and the more false, that while the Republic was ever jealous of its rights and was ever ready to defend them against what she termed the encroachments of Rome, she had remained in the matter of religion exceedingly catholic, and had no intention whatever of embracing the faith of those whose alliance she sought.

With regard to her relations with Turkey, she found similar obstacles to fight against. Her paramount interests, her wide frontiers, open on every side to incursions from barbarian hordes, and her possessions in the Levant which were open to the fleets of the Sultan, obliged her to be most guarded in her manner with him. The maintenance of general peace in the East, of a solid and friendly understanding between herself and the Turks, which was however precarious and needed the constant intervention of the Republic's agent at Constantinople to arrange matters between the Sultan and other persons, constituted the object which the Republic had in view at the Porte. Hence the exceptional position which she occupied, and of which she made capital for the benefit of her commerce and of her navigation. Thus whilst in the West her interests brought her in contact with heretics, they acted similarly with infidels in the East. But these same interests required that she should maintain good relations with the Pope, who was the custos fidei, and whose influence was everywhere felt, with the Emperor, who was the first prince in Europe, and with the King of Spain, the most powerful of Christian sovereigns. It was no easy matter to conciliate the confidence and favour of the Kings of France, England, and of the Sultan, without displeasing the Pope, the Emperor, or the King of Spain. It formed, however, the basis of the foreign policy of the Venetian Government, and the principal duty of its diplomatic agents. When Sixtus V. became Pope, Nicolas de Ponte was Doge, but he died the same year, and Pascal Cigogna succeeded him.

Savoy,¹ that is to say the duchy of that name, united with Piedmont, which the peace of 1559 had restored to its legitimate owner, was looked upon as the rampart of Italy, while Emmanuel Philibert was considered one of the most eminent men of the day. He was a near relative of Philip II. through his mother, a daughter of King Manuel of Portugal, and the sister of both the mother and first wife of Philip, besides being nearly allied to the house of France by his marriage with Madame Marguerite, daughter of Francis I. To these family ties corresponded the geographical position of his States, which were contiguous to France and to Spain. Savoy was on the borders of France, and Piedmont on those of the Milanese provinces, then Spanish territory. In these family connexions there existed means of turning to advantage the difficulties which arose from territorial conformation. Emmanuel Philibert was equal to the task. He had seen the world, been to Court in England, had followed his uncle Charlemagne during his German wars, and his cousin Philip at Barcelona; he had commanded in chief the Spanish armies in Flanders, and had been victorious at St. Quentin. At one time the prospect of becoming King of England had opened itself before him. His marriage with Elizabeth had been settled, the marriage-contract had been signed, and his proxy had been appointed, when the project was put an end to. It was only after long and rough experience, after seeing what war is and waging it on a large scale, after playing a part on such immense stages, that he returned to Savoy, there to take possession of his small State and bury himself in its mountains. The Venetian agents accredited at his Court have left us a portrait of this remarkable man. He was small, thin, all muscle and bone, with a clear complexion and fair hair which reminded one of the German origin of the house in which he gloried. Graceful, gracious, self-possessed, he never said a harsh or inconsiderate word even before people of the lower orders, and stood always upright. An indefatigable walker and sportsman, he was the despair of the ambassadors who accompanied him, and whom when he had to speak to them on business he used to receive in his garden in all weathers. He was very fond of mathematics and passionately devoted to the study of occult sciences; spoke several languages, German and Spanish perfectly, French with 'Madame illustrissime' and her son, Italian with everybody. Though simple in his ways and somewhat parsimonious, he was surrounded by a numerous court, and adopted in the style of the House of Austria the severe Burgundian rules of etiquette. According to the notions of the times, and like all the other Italian princes, Emmanuel Philibert ruled and governed absolutely, and mostly without listening to his ministers except indeed to his post-master or 'spy' as he is somewhat artlessly described by a Venetian diplomatist. His principal preoccupations were his foreign policy, and his relations with the two great powers of the day, France and Austria. He was bound to Philip by as sincere a friendship as his position could justify ; but though there were occasional differences between them, their friendship maintained itself. It is evident that early recollections of mutual services rendered, to which Emmanuel Philibert was indebted for his restoration, and the high reputation which he enjoyed as a warrior and a statesman, as well as ties of blood and gratitude, exercised over him a powerful influence, without, however, preventing his mildly but persistently fighting against Spanish preponderance whenever he met with it, which he did a little everywhere. He kept up old relations in Germany, knew personally most of the Electors, and corresponded with some of them. Petty ambitions and lofty aspirations intermingled somewhat in his character, but, on the whole, the good predominated. His aim was to increase the weight which, when the day came, he might be able to throw into the scale, and thus to insure his independence in any future European complications. Whilst adroitly giving himself up to a game which he saw himself fatally condemned to play between the two great rival houses, he succeeded, where his son failed, in keeping himself free from the suspicion of duplicity. To know Italy under Sixtus V., it is necessary to know Emmanuel Philibert of Savoy and Cosmo of Tuscany, who, though both dead at the time, still lived by the impulse which they had given to the affairs of their country.

Charles Emmanuel, aged nineteen on his accession, and twenty-four at the death of Gregory XIII., had just married, at Saragossa, the Infanta Catherine, daughter of Philip II. This marriage, which was the fruit of negotiations extending back to the time when the prince was still a child, and which at last succeeded, greatly to the displeasure of Catherine of Medici, naturally attached the young Duke for some years to his father-in-law's policy. Not a moment was to be lost in turning this alliance to the benefit of his ambitious views, and thus in complicating the already troubled state of European affairs.

Florence had already left far behind the olden days of turbulent liberty, and was reduced to a principality, which Pius V. had endowed with the title of a grand-duchy, and which had been increased in territory, thanks to a diplomatic stratagem which elicited high praise at the time for the Duke, but for which the Escorial never forgave him, by the annexation of the town and territory of Sienna. But, from its extent and resources, Florence, or rather the grand-duchy of Tuscany, still held the first place among Italian States after Rome and Venice. Cosmo, the memory of whose deeds still lived in the recollection of all, was considered to be, and is, the type of the Italian prince of that day. He possessed all the requisite qualities: he was deep, mysterious, dissembling, and impartial whenever his interests were not at stake: he had a taste for arts and sciences, energy, and an iron hand which could fell an adversary. His proverbial luck had increased the prestige of his name, and this luck was attributed to the circumstance of his being born under the same constellation as Augustus and Charles V. His political aim abroad was to obtain the protection of both the Pope and of the House of Austria. Enjoying the never-changing friendship of both Maximilian and of Rodolph, he questioned that of Philip II., whom he constantly feared as a disagreeable neighbour who might become dangerous, for he still occupied the presidency over the Maremma, and meditated the retaking of Sienna, and so contrived, in order to divert the King's attention from Italian affairs, to embroil him in difficulties with the Sultan through his agent at Pera. But Rome formed his principal care, for not only was it necessary to maintain the friendship of the reigning Pope, which was doubly precious to him inasmuch as that of Philip was uncertain, but also to insure the good graces of the Pope's successor, that is of the eligible cardinals, and what was still more important, to deprive of any chance of success those among the latter who might seem hostile to him. The Pope's protection was indispensable to him, and a condition of the stability of his newly-formed power, based as that power was upon fear, and only repressing with difficulty as yet the half-smothered passions of the existing ancient parties. 'To his intrigues, next to God,' says the ambassador Mocenigo, 'does Pius IV. owe his tiara;' and it will be seen how important a part Ferdinand of Medici, the Grand-Duke's son, took at the election of Sixtus V. According to the testimony of his contemporaries, Cosmo was the most admired and most hated man in Italy.

For many years, Francis, who had rather inherited the faults than the qualities of his father, had been regent. His mother was a Spanish lady, daughter of a Viceroy of Naples belonging to the Toledo family, of which the Dukes of Alva are the head. It was only after having endeavoured in vain to marry a natural daughter of Charles V., who had been made Duchess of Parma, that Cosmo had united himself to that lady, thus anticipating the wishes of the Emperor which he considered to be orders. His son, however, could aspire to the hand of an Archduchess of Austria, so great had the Medici become in so few years! After the death of the Archduchess Jeanne, Francis married Bianca Capello, whose adventures are known and who was adopted by the State as a daughter of the Venetian Republic. He had visited Rome, Madrid, and Vienna, the three great centres where, like his father, he looked for the guarantees of his power. His person, his manner of living and of dressing, all bore the print of the Spanish influence which still predominated in Italy, and was to be found in the ideas and customs of that time.

All the other princes in the Peninsula had lost their independence, and had no political existence but a borrowed one. Such were the Gonzagas at Mantua, the Farnese at Parma, the Duke della Rovere at Urbino, and Alphonso d'Este at Ferrara, whom the genius and misfortunes of Tasso have rendered illustrious. So was it also with the republics of Genoa and Lucca; the one preserving her riches and her magnificent monuments, without her previous political greatness; the other barely maintaining a false appearance of independence. As for Sicily, Naples, and the Milanese, placed as they were under the Spanish dominion, these were governed respectively by the Grand Constable Marco Antonio Colonna, one of the heroes of Lepanto ; by the Duke of Ossuna, and by Don Carlos of Aragon, Duke of Terranova, one of the remaining veterans of Charles V.'s armies, who owed his antecedents to great influence at Court, and whose Sicilian origin secured him the popularity which he enjoyed with the Milanese. In all difficult and pressing cases, his counsels were sought by ambassadors, generals, and agents of Philip in Italy, in Switzerland, or in Franche Comté, who were anxious to cover their own responsibility.

The 'caravans'¹ of the sovereign order of Malta were a constant source of difficulties to the Venetians. Whilst they compromised their position at Constantinople, they jeopardised the peace of Italy, nay even that of Europe, in its relations with the Sultan. The Tuscan knights of St. Stephen were equally obnoxious, and political men were of opinion that chivalry, having become more dangerous than useful, had served its time. The satirical pen of Cervantes was soon to damage it for ever in public opinion.

Cardinal d'Este, himself an Italian prince, gives of Italy the following description : 'Should the Duke of Savoy arm, the King of Spain must increase his forces in the Milanese. The Venetians, who are already apprehensive of his Majesty's intentions upon their frontier towns of Brescia and Bergamo, will not fail to arm likewise; the Grisons also; and the King of France, having to protect the Marquisate of Saluzzo, will do the same. The Duke of Mantua will arm against the intentions of the Duke of Savoy upon Montferrat, and Genoa will arm because the territories of all these encircle her own. But if Venice arms strongly, the Duke of Ferrara must do the same, nor can the Duke of Tuscany do less. This will occasion an increase in the Spanish garrisoning troops at Porto d'Ercole and other ports, and also armaments on the part of the Luccans and of the Duke of Urbino. Whilst, however, this armament on the part of every prince and potentate in Italy must occasion an expense of some millions of money, it will be difficult to avoid on all sides the opportunity of making use of those arms which each will hold, besides the already too numerous rancours and pretensions which animate them. There is not a corner of Italy where a traveller will not find some pretension of one prince over the right of the other. Our Holy Father himself, who in time of peace is revered by every prince, will be calumniated and detested by many who will impute to him a great part of the misfortunes brought about by the war, which they will believe he ought to have foreseen and prevented, but did not do so. Besides which it must not be believed that Italians are satisfied with settling their quarrels among themselves: those who are afraid of defeat will call to their help and introduce foreign nations into Italy, who will thus have the means of again committing those spoliations for which they were remarkable on former occasions, and from the horrors of which even Rome was not exempted, for she was sacked oftener than any other known town.'¹

In fine, the state of Italy was not very satisfactory. Except the Pope, who represented a principle, Venice and the Duke of Savoy, who were obliged to mix in European affairs, all the other Princes and States had but their individual and local interests at heart: first their legitimate desire to exist, and next of becoming more important, for never did the want of power lessen their ambition. In order to insure their existence and prepare a chance of aggrandisement, they had sworn fealty to Spain, then predominant; not, however, to the exclusion of France, whose protection they were ready to ask so soon as she should have regained the strength which she had lost through civil wars. The peace of Italy, so ardently desired by the Pope who had just died, as it was to be likewise by his active successor, was not consolidated. A spark was sufficient to provoke a war.

¹ Paris. Bibl. Imp. Coll. Harlay. Mémoire annexed to his letter to M. Villeroy of the 22nd of Sep. 1586, concerning the attempt of Charles Emmanuel against Geneva. Though written fifteen months later than the date of the accession of Sixtus V., the 'mémoire' applies admirably to the state of Italy at the death of Gregory XIII.

CHAPTER IV.

THE CAUSES AND RESULTS OF THE RENAISSANCE.

A GREAT change had taken place in Rome since the middle of the century.¹ To understand it, it is necessary to go back to the times when the Popes, on their return from Avignon, began to strengthen their temporal power, which had been much shaken in their capital, and to raise the latter from the state of anarchy and prostration into which it had fallen during their absence. This work of reconstruction dates from the advent of Martin V. to the pontifical throne.

At that time the Italy of the Middle Ages had ceased to exist. A new element, the genius, as it were, of the old times springing up from its ashes, had invaded every mind, beginning with the exceptionally great, and then gaining the upper classes, the governing powers, princes, chiefs, and town magistrates of free towns, literary circles, and finally, though not so powerfully, even the members of the high clergy, and of the monastic orders. This element

¹ We do not intend writing the history of the Papacy from Martin V. to Gregory XIII. We think it, however, necessary to recall it to the reader's memory, and to indicate to him those points from which he will best be able to judge the pontificate of Sixtus V. with impartiality.

already pervaded the arts and the sciences, affected the customs of the day, and even compromised the prevalent creed. The age of the renaissance had come.¹ Conspicuous among the leaders of this pacific revolution were the scholars known under the name of 'humanists.' They filled every public chair, enjoyed the confidence of princes, were at the disposal of republican governments, or of the then numerous great and small barons of Italy. Appointed in most cases for a very limited period, perhaps for six or twelve months only, as actors now-a-days are hired for the season, they were always travelling, spread throughout the Peninsula, and for a long time enjoyed a great authority. Blinded, however, by success, they became their own destroyers. Their presumption, their cynicism, their contempt of the forms to be observed, their avarice, their immorality, made them each day more odious; and when, towards the end of the century, printing, which had recently been introduced into Italy, had spread about the country cheap editions of the classics as well as lexicons, they suddenly found themselves bereft of that monopoly which they had enjoyed and abused during the preceding years. Revered at first as the propagators of science, endured afterwards as a necessity, and finally falling into general discredit because people had learnt to do without them, these scholars had instilled into the Italian mind the religion of antiquity. Those of their number who were most considered were the Hellenists, the Greek mania reigning supreme during the whole of the fifteenth century, its golden era. At the beginning of the sixteenth century the mania rapidly fell, and under Leo X. it had almost disappeared from the world to take refuge in the schools, where it found its last asylum. To obtain masters, recourse had been had to the East, whence Greek and Byzantine scholars had come for very high wages. Nor was it until the taking of Constantinople by the Turks that a stop was put to this importation. The fact is thus explained that during the first half of the century the educated people of Italy spoke Greek, while during the latter half they both read and wrote it, but no longer conversed in that language. The principal centres of Greek teaching were Florence, and after Florence, Bologna, Padua, Rome, Ferrara, Venice, Perugia, Pavia. In the fashionable world enormous sums were spent in obtaining multiplied copies of the old manuscripts. Libraries were formed. Printed books (though much sought after by the poorer classes) were not much appreciated by the learned, who, long after the introduction of printing, boasted that they possessed manuscripts only. Women shared the general mania, especially those in the higher spheres of society. Italian, though ennobled by Dante, Boccaccio, and Petrarch, fell into discredit and continued to be called the vulgar tongue. With few exceptions (and among these must be mentioned Count Boiardo, whose poem, however, appeared at the time that 'humanism' was expiring), the authors most in favour all affected to despise their mother tongue.

It is difficult to form an idea of the vehemence of this very general impulse towards the classical studies, and still more so to discover its causes. Fashion—that despotic and only apparently capricious deity, for she is born within the deepest recesses of the human heart, of which she represents the instability in frivolous and in serious things alike—may explain a good deal, but not all. From whatever cause, however, that impulse was born, it was irresistible.

Fascinated by charms hitherto concealed from their view, anxious, by the help of the learned of the day, the ‘humanists,’ to tear away the veil which hid them, and anxious also to sound the mysteries of antiquity, the neophytes rushed to that majestic temple which was ready to receive them under the shades of its porticoes, to open its sanctuary to their gaze, and to bestow its treasures upon them. Pagan science was to heal every wound, to insure for ever the happiness of humanity. Of course the impulse became general. Some, and they were the least numerous, were carried away by the thirst of knowledge, others by curiosity, most by the contagious effects of example, and discomforted souls by the hope of finding in the philosophy of the ancients, which could only unsettle them still more by creating doubts in their minds, those consolations which they ceased to seek in faith.

The arts likewise were carried away by the current. With the single exception of Frà Angelico de Fiesole, the influence of the humanists may be traced in various degrees in almost all the great masters of the fifteenth century. The study of the antique, the worship of the senses, and the realism which had superseded the mysticism of former times, enabled them to become emancipated from the traditions of the Middle Ages, and to break the links which fettered their genius, and clashed with the new manners of the reformed society. But, strange to say, however transformed they might be, the arts as of old never ceased to be devoted almost exclusively to the service of the Church, a devotion, however, which resembled that of those unfaithful servants who are on the eve of expropriating their master if he does not look out. To be convinced of this it is only necessary to look at the funeral monuments of the renaissance in the churches of Rome, Venice, Florence—Genii grouped around the Virgin and the saints, it is true, but extinguishing the torches of life—statues gracefully placed upon tombs, but no longer appearing as if they were standing before the Supreme Judge, nor sleeping the sleep of the just man awaiting the resurrection—Greek inscriptions—mythological symbols and ornaments—putti that are no angels—nymphs that are not saints, and whose classical outlines, though little veiled, then shocked nobody, but which in our eyes contrast so strangely with the sanctity of the place. Churches still were built; but the buildings appear less to bear testimony to a religious inspiration than to the prevalent love of art, which had no other field whereon to display itself. They were almost always deserted, and the faithful complained that the officials showed little reverence and care in the performance of their ecclesiastical functions. There is nothing wonderful in this. Religious convictions had become weakened by their contact with Paganism. The immortality of the soul was at first in a screened manner, but afterwards openly, denied. The fundamental notions of Christianity, the knowledge of sin and of the redemption, were fast disappearing. Little by little the Epicureans, as those were called who denied a future existence,¹ made no scruple in avowing their sentiments, and ran little or no risk in confessing their apostasy. Machiavel could dare to assert that the Christian religion appeared to him to be unfavourable to the liberty of States. Fatalism taking the place of faith gave to astrology, which then was so widespread among the Christian nations, and which the Spaniards alone rejected from hatred to the Moors who practised it, the fresh zest, which it likewise communicated to alchemy, necromancy, and other occult sciences or practices common to superstition. The rupture with faith was more, however, in the mind than in the heart. It was not an uncommon event to see 'humanists' who had spent their lives in diffusing Epicurean doctrines, end their days by asking for and receiving the sacraments. The number of those who had ceased to practise religion was such, that when a priest had been called to the bedside of a dying man he used to ask first whether he was a believer.² While, however, the floods of infidelity

² 'Se avevano fede.' Vasari (Vite de' Pittori, 1568) says of Pietro Perugino that he had little religion and never could be made to believe in the immortality of the soul. Several modern writers, and especially M. Mezzanote (Vita di Pietro Vanucci, Peruggio, 1837) have combated this belief, but without being able to prove the contrary. A tradition were thus rapidly rising, there occurred, by way of a striking contrast, several instances of noted returns to the faith. Never did preaching missionaries obtain greater success. They penetrated wherever irreligion and immorality had most corrupted the people, and at their voice whole populations were seized with remorse. The fact is, Paganism in the fifteenth century had not solidly established its rule, but was on the eve of victory when the Popes returned to Italy. The innovation had coincided with their departure for Avignon, and had reached its climax under the pontificate of Sixtus IV. It only subsided in presence of the great Catholic reaction which the Reformation called forth.

At the time when Martin V. came back to Rome, and during the remainder of the century, Italy bore the strangest aspect. Arts and sciences shone with unprecedented brilliancy, and manners had become more refined while they had relaxed. Courts, free towns, universities, every centre of public life, bore marks of the enormous progress which had been made, thanks to the study and newly-acquired knowledge of antiquity. Side by side with this brilliant spectacle of civilisation appeared, however, the dark which still exists in Umbria, would seem to prove Vasari's statement. Be the fact however true or not, what deserves notice here, as a sign of the epoch, is that Pietro, who had spent his long life in painting Madonnas and saints, was accused not more than forty-four years after his death, not of Protestantism, but of want of Christian faith, of fifteenth century-kind of Paganism, and that this accusation was believed in his own country, where he had almost always lived, and which he had inundated with his works, representing for the most part religious and essentially Catholic subjects.

shades of barbarism, if such we may call the effects produced by the absence of any moral code, and hence the laxity introduced into the public morals,—the consequent deficiency in the administration of justice, the impunity thus afforded to the commission of crime, the absence of any public right, and hence the want of stability in the governments;—if, further, we may characterise by the term barbarism the despotic rule of princes whose power knows no control, not even that of religion or morality, and the consequent want of security to life and property, as well as the absence of all the guarantees which society claims.

How did the Popes behave in presence of such a new state of things? Were they indifferent to it, or did they resist the innovation, or, again, were they carried away by it?

From the pontificate of Martin V. up to the time of the great Catholic reaction of the sixteenth century, the Papacy went through two distinct phases. We first see upon the throne of St. Peter a series of pious holy men, each penetrated with the sanctity of his high office, and pontiffs in the true sense of the word. To these succeed after Sixtus IV. another series of prelates who may be called political pontiffs. The first are absorbed in the task of repairing evil. They endeavour to pacify Italy, to rebuild Rome, above all to save the Church by finally putting an end to the great schism of the West, and a momentary one to that of the East. They strive to save the Christian world, by preaching war against the infidels that threaten it, the Moors in the West, the Turks in the East: the one nearly extinguished, the other more formidable than ever since their taking of Constantinople and their appearance in the waters of Apulia. None of these Popes except Paul II., the least learned of them, appear to have been alarmed by the increased attention bestowed upon the study of letters or the activity and influence of the humanists. They loved and encouraged the literary movement. Thomas Parentucelli, who later became Nicholas V., and began life as a preceptor,¹ the real type of the professor, clever, sarcastic, and with a slightly doctoral countenance, was himself a humanist, but a Christian one. Founder of the Vatican library, he was surrounded by men of letters, all as pious and learned as himself, spent money munificently to further the ends of science and to collect manuscripts, and, confident in the power of Christian knowledge and mind, he never dreaded the resurrection of pagan philosophy.

Next to the duties of his pontificate, and to the efforts which he was never tired of making to obtain peace for Italy, his whole attention was devoted to the culture of letters and to favouring those who made them their occupation. Vespasian of Bisticci, a clever and agreeable contemporary of Nicholas V., a stationer by trade, but enjoying the intimacy of persons of the highest rank,² gives, in his biography of this Pope, a list of the scholars he employed, as well as of the works which they wrote under his impulse. Therein are found, together with works upon the Scriptures and the Fathers, translations of the 'Iliad,' of Strabo, of Herodotus, of Thucydides, of Xenophon, of Diodorus, of Aristotle, of the 'Republic' of Plato. 'I note only,' says Vespasian, 'that which I know;' and adds, 'Pope Nicholas was the light and ornament of letters and of the erudite; and if his successors had followed his example, sciences would have greatly developed, but for want of encouragement they fall from bad to worse.' These words specially apply to the 'political' Popes, to Sixtus IV. and Alexander VI., who had too much to do to trouble themselves about the learned and their works.

The learned Eneas Sylvio, afterwards Pope Pius II., though one of the most enlightened men of his day, was already too much taken up by multifarious occupations to devote to the literary movement any special attention. Anxious to fight the infidels, to re-conquer himself the tomb of our Lord, he died at Ancona, at the very time that a Venetian fleet entered the harbour to take him on board and carry him off to the Holy Land.

Paul II., who unites the two categories of 'church' and 'state' Popes, was the first to conceive some fears as to the orthodoxy of the humanists. They revenged themselves by heaping insults upon him,¹ and complained that he accused them of heresy. His vindicators hold that 'he loved the learned, and would always do so provided they were good.'² Hence it is clear that the action against the humanists and their influence was then being determined before the tribunal of public opinion. After Paul II. the era of the political Popes begins—the epoch of Sixtus IV., of Innocent VIII., of Alexander VI., of Julius II., of Clement VII. Not that any of them ever disregarded or completely neglected his duties as Head of the Church and guardian of the faith, for even Alexander VI. himself was looked upon by his contemporaries as a great Pope, unfortunate though his memory is to us. The history of his reign, which has still to be written, must have come down to us in a very altered form, or the moral sense of his generation must have been strangely perverted, since Ariosto in his poem published under Leo X. and while Lucrezia Borgia was still alive, could sing the praises of the latter without offending the public conscience. It is an unquestionable fact, however, that all these princes were taken up solely with the desire of consolidating their power, of acquiring new territories by conquest or otherwise, and by mundane or political preoccupations. Julius II., the most considered of these sovereigns, and one of the hardest generals of Europe, who strengthened, enlarged, and saved the temporal power, and with it the Papacy itself, is the most striking instance of this fact.

How are we to account for this glaring contrast between the two series of pontiffs, the one solely devoted to their spiritual mission, the others mostly given up to fostering their worldly interests? Fate, just because it explains everything, explains nothing. Dynastic policy, common to many reigning families in Europe, and traceable in them through the course of centuries, cannot exist in Rome, since the Popes are indebted to election and not to hereditary descent for their tiara. We must therefore seek elsewhere for the causes of this phenomenon.

Italy was then going through one of those great crises, through which generations appear to float at the mercy of the waves between two shores—that which they have left for ever, and another which, though still out of sight, they are about to be landed upon. The ideas, traditions, and routine of the Middle Ages had been left aside. Science, strengthened by its contact with the knowledge handed down by antiquity, and free from the trammels of faith, expounded theoretically either that which the passions of the princes of that age dictated to them, or the doubts expressed by the sceptics, or the insolent requests of those who had revolted against the Christian morality. By the light of this science, which was fed by the fire of ‘humanism,’ society sought, without yet finding it, the proper place which it was to fill in the new world about to issue from this chaos. No one overlooks the merit of the humanists, their wonderful knowledge, the great scientific discoveries for which the world is indebted to them; but it is certain now,¹ that, without being altogether the authors of the change, they played a great part in its development, in the direction which it followed, and in the confusion which it created both in the minds and subsequently in the morals of the people.

It is clear that some time must have elapsed before the effects of the new doctrines became visible. Ideas, like plants, are gradual in their development. Humanism was in full growth under those Popes whom we have designated Pontiffs in contradistinction with their more worldly successors, but showed not yet the fruits which some day were to be gathered from it. The evil was preparing then, while it was over during the reign of the others. The hopes which the learned and generous Nicholas had built on the activity of the humanists had not been realised. The contrary had come to pass. In the time of Sixtus IV. and of his immediate successors, when the Renaissance, which had sprung during the fourteenth century, was bearing its fruit, the intellectual atmosphere of Italy was essentially impure. Is it therefore to be wondered at that those who breathed that air, even though they were Popes, should experience its influence? How did matters stand? Politically, there was a total absence of public law, and socially a shaking of every religious conviction, as well as great relaxation in the public morals. In the higher classes the pagan 'nihilism' had made great conquests. The Italian princes thought of nothing but aggrandisement, and despised no means provided their ambition were satisfied. The Popes, in order to save themselves, had to follow the political movement. Had they not done so, they would soon have seen themselves expelled from Rome, and compelled again to seek refuge in foreign lands. Such is the excuse which some of them can allege, while others, like Julius II., can bring it forward as the justification of the conduct followed by them during their reign. But there occurred then what always happens in difficult situations when each has a separate cause, and that the balance between them is broken. The one develops only at the expense of the other. As each successive Pope (sometimes, but not always, fatally) took part in the political transactions of the day, they became estranged from the spiritual character of their mission, without however, we must repeat, absolutely failing in this respect. A tendency became manifest which was essentially incompatible with the duties of the successors of St. Peter, viz. to insure to members of the Pope's family, to nephews and their descendants, a share in the power of the State. The dynastic feeling encroached upon the Papal obligations. Religion, the Church, and all the interests that concern them, were running the greatest risk. Faith had become weakened in many minds, while no other convictions filled up the void. To the excessive enjoyments and well-nigh intoxication of the intellect, disgust and gloominess had succeeded. But the reaction had not yet reached the heads of the movement. While Leo X. was devoted to the arts, and had little concern in the affairs of the Church, or in those of the State, unless the ambition of his family obliged¹ him to look to the latter; and while Clement VII., that unfortunate sovereign, wrote down in his annals the name of Luther, the severance of England from the Catholic world, and the sack of Rome, the great reaction against the religious innovations of the North was maturing, and ever inflaming with more ardour those who had remained faithful, while it made an easy conquest of a great number who had gone astray, and who to its force could oppose nothing better than the emptiness of Pagan teaching. Prepared at first quietly in the midst of the diseased society which was clamorous for consolation, the reaction broke out during the pontificate of Paul III., Clement's successor, and, following a course of success, appeared at one time as destined to re-establish unity of faith throughout the world.

By destroying the stronghold where they were wont to meet, the sack of Rome gave their death-blow to the humanists. Obligated to leave, they fled to all parts. Their reign was over. Under the influence of a storm which had broken upon the Eternal City, the atmosphere had suddenly changed and become as it were purified. A new era was at hand.

Paul III. was born in 1468. One of the most celebrated among the humanists, Pomponio Leti, who had been persecuted by Paul II., restored to favour by Sixtus IV., and had been much appreciated by Alexander VI., took charge of his education. Having pursued his studies in Florence, and successfully terminated his course of classical lectures, young Farnese returned to Rome, to live in the vitiated and seductive court of the Borgias. Speaking of this time, one of the ambassadors from Venice writes : ' His life was not a holy one, and even during the time of his cardinalship, which lasted more than forty years, he took little part in the affairs of the State.'¹ When a young man he had had a son by a lady from Ancona, Pierluigi Farnese. On his accession to the Papal throne, he gave this son Camerino, and later, as an exchange and to hold them as fiefs of the Church, the duchies of Parma and Piacenza; this being the last instance of a portion of Pontifical territory having been alienated in favour of a member of the Pope's family. After the assassination of Pierluigi, Paul III., who already felt the influence of the reaction, wished to incorporate afresh the duchy of Parma with the domains of the Church, but by indemnifying his grandson Ottavio, and giving him the State of Camerino instead. Repaid with ingratitude by those he had loved too well, the old man died of grief, incessantly repeating in his last hour the words: 'Were I not mastered by him, I would now be pure and purified of a great sin.' In politics, with the exception of his quarrels with Charles V. on account of those same duchies of Parma and Piacenza, he devoted his attention to pacifying Europe. As head of the Church, he fought bravely for the defence of the faith. In his life may be seen, therefore, the two currents which meet and struggle for supremacy. The old current, still omnipotent when Farnese began life, ever exercised over him a certain ascendancy, but the new one was the stronger of the two. The Pontiff redeemed, by his zeal for the good of the Church, the follies of the young patrician and the weakness of the father.

The same contrast between the two opposite tendencies appears for the last time, but in a lesser degree, under Paul IV. Caraffa, the monk, and founder of the Order of the Theatines, ascended the Papal throne with all the ardour, energy, and severity which characterise the great Catholic reaction. The old Papal Nuncio in England, at Naples, in Spain, the intimate counsellor of Charles V., had not bidden good-bye, however, to the affairs of state. Hating, as did most of the Neapolitan gentlemen, the Spanish dominion, he called down upon himself, by his provocation of Philip II., the mortification of seeing the Duke of Alva enter Rome alone, after beating the Papal troops, and prostrate himself at the feet of the vanquished Pope. Weak in his political action, still weaker in his parental affections, he allowed himself to be governed by his nephews, enriched them at the expense of Colonna, but, ended by expelling them from Rome. The Venetian envoys believe, but without proving the fact, that he began the reckless war against Spain for no other purpose than to set the Caraffas on the Neapolitan throne. This supposition, whether true or false, proves, however, that in the diplomatic circles, that was looked upon as probable which the new Catholic opinion regarded as impossible.

At the advent of Pius IV. the triumph of the reaction in Italy was certain; under that of Pius V. it was complete. There are no more political Popes, and nepotism has changed its essence. The heads of the Church, now completely absorbed by their apostolic avocations, no longer dare create sovereignties in favour of their nephews at the expense of Church property. Pius V. was the first to condemn nepotism, and by his celebrated bull 'Admonet nos'¹ prohibited in future the alienation by any Pope of any towns, territories, or other places belonging to the Church. This bull, which was signed in a consistory by thirty-nine cardinals, who swore to observe its clauses, was subsequently confirmed by several Pontiffs.

The reaction, born of the great centre where all the intellects unite and all the social energies congregate, after passing in turn through every stage of ecclesiastical distinction, was then obtaining its last success, that of moving the Pope himself. Pius V., representative of the epoch of generation and struggle which had just been entered upon, is the first since Clement V.—that is, since the end of the thirteenth century—among the successors of St. Peter who obtained the honours of canonisation; he is also the last. The war was waged :
• the engagement was general. To stop the progress of Protestantism, to reform the Church, and thus to save it: these were the objects of the reactionary movement and the motives which impelled those who guided its course, i.e. Pius V., Gregory XIII., Sixtus V. The Venetian envoys at the Court of Rome are unanimous in praising the efforts which these Popes made in the cause. 'Truly,' says Lorenzo Priuli,² 'it would seem as if our Lord God had cast his eye of clemency upon Christendom in giving to the world since the last Council three successive Pontiffs who have well executed its decisions to the advantage of every Christian nation.'

² Rel. Ven. Lorenzo Priuli, 1586. Paolo Tiepolo, 1576, expresses himself similarly in speaking of Pius V. and Gregory XIII.

At this time also Protestantism, which had made great and rapid progress in the North, was preparing to invade the Peninsula. In the universities, in the churches, doctrines were often propounded from the various chairs and pulpits which could scarcely be called otherwise than heretical. Partial defections, sufficiently rare it is true, but alarming as symptoms, took place in some religious communities. Monks and novices were escaping clandestinely to Geneva, which was the nearest and most dreaded centre of Calvinism. In the higher ecclesiastical regions, the spirit of innovation was already beginning to obtain proselytes to its cause. Cardinal Morone and the celebrated Dominican Carranza, Archbishop of Toledo, who were unjustly accused of heresy and imprisoned on that account, are the most illustrious victims of that era of fear and distrust. Everyone knew that if the Reformation, which already triumphed in parts of Germany, France, Poland, and Hungary, and in the whole of England as well as Scandinavia, succeeded also beyond the Alps, Italy could not in the end escape a similar fate. The state of Spain gave equal cause for apprehension. Society was therefore placed between Protestantism on the one hand, which was ready to cross the Alps, and a weakened faith and corrupted morals, the inheritance left by humanism, the effects of which they were only beginning justly to appreciate. Of the two dangers to be apprehended, the first was the most apparent. Both were so formidable that Rome, awe-stricken and discouraged though not paralysed in her action, appeared at one time to despair of salvation.

Proofs of this state of things are innumerable. Luigi Mocenigo, Venetian ambassador at the courts of Paul IV. and Pius IV., writes in 1560 : ‘ Your Serenity is aware that in many countries obedience is almost denied to the Pope, and matters are becoming so critical that, if the Lord God does not interfere, they will soon be in a worse and almost desperate condition. Germany, which even more than any other country was religious and obedient to the Holy See, is now in a bad way, and leaves little hope of being cured. Poland also is in almost as desperate a state, and the scandals and disorders which have taken place in France and in Spain are too well known for me to speak of them. The kingdom of England, formerly an obedient servant of the Holy Church, after a short time since returning to her old obedience, has again, as everyone knows, fallen into heresy. The spiritual power of the Pontiff is thus so straitened that if, by means of the Council which is to be convoked with the consent of every sovereign prince, the affairs of our religion are not settled more satisfactorily, the greatest evils are to be apprehended.’

Three years later, another envoy, Girolamo Soranzo, writes to the Doge : ‘ A few days previously to my departure from Rome, the illustrious Carpi, the eldest of the Sacred College and a truly prudent cardinal, told me, that during his last illness, he had fervently prayed God to let him die rather than witness the obsequies of Rome. Other cardinals, enjoying the highest reputation, do not cease deploring their misfortune, which they look upon as all the greater that they neither know nor see a remedy, unless it pleased the Lord God to bestow one with His own hands. And the illustrious Morone (who, as last President of the Council of Trent, shares with the Emperor Ferdinand I. the honour and merit of having brought it to a satisfactory conclusion) told me on leaving for the Council that there was no hope for the Catholic religion (nulla spes erat).¹

But great perils give rise to great measures, or rather they discover them. The alarm once sounded, every one was on foot. A holy league was formed as if by enchantment. From all parts and all ranks the combatants poured in, and in the midst of the ranks of this army of faith the chiefs were chosen. To be strengthened for the fight, by means of prayer, abnegation, and the exercise of those holy Christian practices which had been so disregarded and so little practised by preceding generations—to gather strength by reforming the clergy and society to cope with the danger which was looked upon and acknowledged as extreme—such was the cry which emanated from the heart of those who were burning with the love of divine things—the rallying motto which spread rapidly and divided the Catholic world into two camps, that which called for reform and that which rejected it. The conversion of those who had become separated from Rome, and the regeneration of those who were lukewarm and indifferent in their faith, formed the twofold object which those had in view who, like the remarkable men and pious women that we see at the opening of the campaign, stood in the front ranks and earned for their name in future centuries the glorious titles of Saints and Beatified of the Church.

To the ranks of this sacred militia every Catholic country, and even some who have ceased to be so, contributed their number. That of Spain was the largest. So chivalrous, sober, earnest, and meditative a nation, which during eight centuries of struggle against the Moors learnt how to wield the sword in the service of the Cross, could not but join with ardour the new crusaders; and, full of the memory of her still recent traditions, she was fired by the example of her veteran heroes, the old soldiers of Ferdinand and Isabella, of Gonzalvo of Cordova, and of the last heroes of Granada. She seized not the sword or the coat of mail, as of old, but the crucifix and the monkish frock, bringing to the fight all the zeal, energy, conviction, and earnestness of olden times.

In 1534, the year of the advent of Paul III., a Basque nobleman, formerly an officer in the armies of Charles V., Ignatius Loyola, whose name has never ceased since to excite the world, laid in Paris, at the 'Buttes Montmartre,' with the help of a few friends, the foundations of the Society of Jesus. In the name given by him to his order may be seen how high were the aspirations of the founder, and, in its military organisation, how great he esteemed the struggle for which he wished to prepare his men by a severe discipline and an implicit obedience. Five years later Paul III. sanctioned the order. A few years later and we find already Francis Xavier, the apostle of the

Indies, carrying on the holy war and pursuing the conquest of souls in the extreme East, Padre Nuñez doing the same in Abyssinia, Padre Gonzalez in Morocco, others in Brazil, in China, and in Japan. At the same time they penetrate into England and into the North, and are admitted in all Catholic countries. At the death of Ignatius, sixteen years only after the foundation of the order, the Society was flourishing in twelve provinces ; those of Portugal, Castile, Andalusia, Aragon ; Italy, which comprised Lombardy and Tuscany, Naples, Sicily ; high and low Germany, France, Brazils, and, finally, in the East Indies. In these provinces there were one hundred colleges or houses belonging to the Jesuits. Shortly they overran Europe. Fathers Larinez and Salmeron, theologians of the Holy See, became conspicuous at the Council of Trent : Father Maffei distinguished himself by his eloquence and the classical purity of his Latin diction : the Duke of Gandia (St. Francis Borgia), the friend of Charles V., formerly Viceroy of Catalonia, by his humility and sanctity : Father Porsevin, who was ever on his way between Rome and Poland, between Moscow and Rome, and was the first diplomatist of the Order, by his ability and experience in the transaction of business. At Rome, the learned P. Toledo enjoyed, during several pontificates, the highest authority. It is he who, by a famous phrase, ‘Clement VII. lost England by precipitancy : Clement VIII. will lose France by too much slowness,’ brought the Pope, after long hesitation, to absolve Henry IV. The opposition which the Jesuits encountered even in the Church can be measured by the prodigious success which they obtained at their outset. The writings, private letters, and diplomatic correspondence of the period are for ever talking of the new Order; and while some exalt its merits, and others blame and even insult it, they all agree in testifying to the great part it has taken in the work of regenerating the Catholic world.

Another Spaniard, P. John d'Avila, who was called the Apostle of Andalusia, is one of the first and most active authors of the reaction. His eloquence moved whole populations. By one of his sermons delivered in the cathedral of Granada he converted a poor Portuguese, who as a common soldier had fought in Flanders and in Hungary, and who of his own accord had subsequently gone to Africa to take care of the Christian slaves. This philanthropist, who became the founder of the 'Fate Bene Fratelli' (St. John of God), lived and died in extreme poverty; but the force of his example proved so powerful with St. Theresa and St. Francis Borgia, that it put an end to the hesitations of the one, and greatly contributed to the decision which the latter took of renouncing the world to embrace religion.

Thanks to Theresa of Cepeda, Avila, where she was born, became one of the centres of the Catholic movement. Lost at the far end of Castile, and situated in the midst of hilly moors, which are interspersed with granite blocks and shut out by sierras from the rest of the world, Avila, more perhaps than any other city in Spain, reminds one, by its battled walls, its half-temple, half-fortress-looking cathedral, and its solares (houses), of the history and genius of the old Spanish race. At every step some emblem of monastic life, or the armorial bearings of gentlemen, the cross and the sword, meet the eye. All about it breathes of prayer and fighting, and on leaving its precincts one finds oneself suddenly thrown into solitude and the silence of a desert, after passing the splendid monasteries of St. Thomas and St. Vincent, which form, as it were, the detached forts of the place. Here it is that St. Theresa, who belonged to one of those noble families who from generation to generation had fought against the Moors, often for and often against their kings, gave herself up entirely to devotion and to the work of reformation, showing in her character that of the city wherein she was born as well as the influence of the day. Here it is that she founded the Order of the Barefooted Carmelites, wrote her mystical works, and embodied in lines worthy of the Castilian muse her passionate outbursts of ecstasy. Subject, like all innovators, to every species of persecution, but fighting bravely and triumphantly against her detractors with the help of Philip II., she died in the convent of Lista, in the arms of the Duchess of Alva, with the satisfaction of having seen that the orders of both friars and nuns which she had instituted were rapidly prospering.

Another Spaniard, St. John of the Cross, of whom St. Theresa says, 'he was small in stature, but big in the eyes of God,'¹ belonged to the order which St. Theresa had founded, and was her compatriot and collaborator. He was martyred, not by his adversaries, but by those very men whose cause he defended. He fell a victim to his refractory monks. St. Peter of Alcantara, of the Order of the 'Recolletti,' also a friend of St. Theresa, reformed Portugal, to which country he had been called by John III. From his retreat in the Sierra d'Arabida, the fantastical appearance of which mountain comes out so gracefully in relief upon the horizon of Lisbon, and from the summit of those barren rocks, at the foot of which an earthly Paradise extends, St. Peter watched and directed the reformation of his Order. Other names equally illustrious in the annals of the Church may be added to those we have mentioned: the two Neapolitan Caracciolos, St. Francis and Fabricius, the blessed John Baptist of the Conception, the founder of the Barefooted 'Trinitarii,' St. Francis Solano of Cordova, the apostle of Peru, the blessed John Leonardi; and among those who shone most conspicuously, St. Charles Borromeo at Milan, and St. Philip Neri at Florence, the founder of the Oratorians.

The name of Charles Borromeo is often met with in the despatches of the foreign envoys in Rome, and in those of the governors of Milan during the latter half of his life, which he entirely spent in his diocese. What most strikes all these several statesmen is¹ the purity of his life. 'His life,' says a Venetian envoy, 'is so pure that he may be said to be exempt from any stain of sin.' 'He leads so exemplary an existence,' says another, 'that by his example he does more good to the Court of Rome than can all the decrees of the Council.' They wonder that a young man, rich, beloved, much spoilt by Pope Pius IV., his uncle, of whom he was a Secretary of State, the dispenser of every favour, the man to whom everyone—ambassadors, cardinals, prelates—all address themselves, should be possessed of so much virtue. 'He has conquered himself, he has conquered the flesh and the world,' exclaims Giacomo Soranzo, who praises the saint's modesty, his reserve, his theological knowledge, and his entire forgetfulness of self. But this same envoy blames his slowness, his scrupulous tendencies, his aversion to asking favours of the Pope, which aversion was not likely to make him popular with courtiers, who had no reason to be satisfied with him. 'He only harbours 150 persons in his palace,' says Girolamo Soranzo, 'many of whom are obliged to defray their own expenses, and to live in Roman fashion—that is, on hope. The Jesuits have induced him, besides his own natural inclination, to lead the holy life which he does. The Pope, who would have liked to see him livelier and spend more, has often exhorted him to lead a less austere existence; but he has not changed his ways.' His revenues, which were close upon fifty thousand scudi, were all spent in charities, or in bestowing dowries on portionless girls, or in paying the debts of his brother. His zeal, however, became a subject of quarrel with the governors appointed by Philip II., who complained to the Pope and thus created serious embarrassments to his Holiness. Though a saint himself, Pius V. complained of the too great strictness of the archbishop.¹ The saints are not always accommodating, no more than were the representatives of Philip II., who were for ever quarrelling either openly or secretly with the ecclesiastical authorities in his Italian possessions. To the encroachments of the Spanish high functionaries the Archbishops of Milan and of Naples replied by excommunication. The Court of Madrid revenged itself, but never carried matters so far as to break with Rome. The untimely death of Charles Borromeo was universally deplored.²

Such were the men who had the honour of being first in the field. Even in a political sense, their biography is precious, for in studying their lives an insight is obtained into the evils which had corrupted the Catholic world. One marvels at the success, and perhaps even more at the courage, of those who undertook to remedy the evil, and one learns never to despair of great causes which are said to be lost beforehand, but which in most cases are only so when they cease to be defended.

The Sacred College, according to some official observers residing in Rome, was better composed than it had ever been. With the exception of some instances

² 'La morte del Cardinale Borromeo se bene universalmente è stata sentita con dispiacere, come se conveniva alla grande ed esemplare religione e bontà di questo santo uomo, però non mancano di quelli che ne risentono qualche contento per il comodo che ne riceveranno.'—Arch. Ven. Disp. fil. 18. Rome, Leop. Priuli, Nov. 1584. The diplomatic correspondence of the time contains, as it were, the elements of his canonisation. of nepotism, and a few favourites who were unworthy of their patron, the men chosen by the Popes since Paul III. to be cardinals were almost all men whose selection was justified by their piety, their learning, or their high origin. Several of them figure among the most renowned personages of the day. Alexander Farnese, called the Great Cardinal, though made a cardinal when only fourteen years of age, a fact which caused great scandal in Rome, proved nevertheless to be one of the stars of the Sacred College. John Fisher, known by his controversy with Luther, died a martyr in England, of which country he was a native. Gasparo Contarini, a Venetian nobleman, known by his embassy to the peace conference of Bologna, was a statesman and a writer of eminence. To these must be added Simonetta, the great lawyer; the pious and zealous Caracciolo, governor of Charles V. in Milan; the modest Sadolet, one of the most eminent Latin scholars of modern times; the illustrious Reginald Pole, of the ducal house of Suffolk, who, elected Pope by 'adoration' (acclamation), refused to wear the tiara because, said he, 'he preferred entering by the door rather than by the window;' Hippolyte d'Este, a real cardinal prince, known for his munificence as well as for his statesman-like qualities; Pietro Bembo, of Venice, one of the last of the humanists and styled the renovator of the Latin and Italian languages, and Giovanni Morone of Milan, who, suspected of heresy, was thrown into the prison of Fort St. Angelo by order of Paul IV., but came out gloriously to terminate the labours of the Council of Trent. Admired by everyone, dreaded by his adversaries, he was, on account of his reserve, called the well (bottomless) of St. Patricius by the ever lively and sarcastic Roman people. With these we see the pious and generous Frederic Cesi ; Pedro Pacheco, one of the stars of the Council ; Charles Borromeo ; and Granvella, the intimate counsellor of Charles V. and his ambassador at the Court of Francis I. Viceroy of Naples, he became the prime minister of Philip II., and one of the most universally appreciated statesmen of his time. Polyglot and clever, he was said to be 'rigid in the service of his God and of his master.' We have also to name Ludovico Madruccio, the great Cardinal of Trent, the confidant of both branches of the house of Austria ; Geseraldo, who during forty-two years of cardinalship constantly gave the example of every Christian virtue ; and Guglielmo Sirletto, one of the numerous instances of hazard being justified by merit. He was a 'famigliare' of a cardinal previously to becoming one himself, thanks to the discernment of Charles Borromeo, who appreciated 'his great science, his great virtue, his profound religious knowledge.' Gabriel Paleotto, professor of law at Bologna, the Cardinals' theologian at the Council of Trent, one of the lights of the day, was compared to St. Charles, and died with the reputation of never having sullied his baptismal innocence.

On the other hand, as we have said, scandal was not backward. The Caraffas, nephews of Paul IV. ; the ignoble del Monte, made a cardinal by Julius III., constitute the other side of the picture. But the men who proved to be unworthy of their exalted position were much less numerous than those who deserved to be considered as ornaments of the Church. But what is most important, at least to understand the new aspect of affairs, is to note how a bad choice (the times of the Borgias had long gone by) was keenly criticised, openly blamed, and became, for the Pope who had made it, a source of so much embarrassment and a cause for so much regret that he hastened to satisfy public opinion by making promotions which would meet with general approbation. This public susceptibility, which is a symptom of the reactionary movement, began with it, under the pontificate of Paul III.¹

All these eminent men formed, as it were, the staff of the great army of faith which the Popes commanded, and of which Rome constituted the headquarters, and the world their field of battle.

From the time of Paul III. the work of reform advanced unceasingly. This Pope it was who instituted the Congregation of the Inquisition, which was composed of six cardinals, and was destined to watch over the purity of the faith. The severity of the inquisitors, exaggerated during the pontificate of Paul IV., was lessened during that of Pius IV., at least in Italy. Still imbued with the spirit and practices of the neo-paganism of the last century, he took special care to reform morals. Julius III., whose character was little inclined to be ascetic, persevered, however, in the same line of conduct, suspended throughout Christendom the granting of indulgences which had had such fatal consequences, and was the first to prohibit reading impious books. With the help of Cardinal Morone and St. Ignatius, he founded the German College, which is still flourishing in Rome. Marcellus II. found time during his twenty-two days' pontificate to stigmatise nepotism, to protest against the interference of Popes in political matters, and to reform sacred music, which had so degenerated that he would have excluded it altogether from church services, had not the immortal Pierluigi Palestrina saved it by the composition of the celebrated mass which bears the name of Marcellus. Paul IV., whose faults were errors of judgment, and whose virtues were those of a saint rather than of a pontiff and a sovereign, continued with implacable zeal the work so well begun. Pius IV. owed to the times in which he lived, and to the aid of Charles Borromeo, the thanks which the Church awards to him. Pius V. was entirely devoted to his apostolical mission. Gregory XIII. was full of attention to the education of the Catholic youth of all countries. Finally came Sixtus V. All these Popes, borne up by the new current of ideas and aided by the knowledge of many eminent men, adopted a series of measures destined to strengthen the Church, and to bring to a satisfactory end the great work of reforming her.

At all times would the assembling of a congress for the purpose of negotiating peace with the enemy and smoothing over difficulties which had arisen among allies, even before hostilities had come to an end, prove a most difficult enterprise and one which offered little hope of success.

This is, however, what was courageously attempted and what good fortune brought to a satisfactory end. The Council of Trent is the greatest success of the reactionary impulse of the sixteenth century. By its decrees, which were drawn up in concert with the head and principal members of the Church and with the co-operation of the great Catholic States, that Council established a new basis for future operations, and arrested the progress of the enemy. Without entirely fulfilling the hopes of Charles V. and of Pius IV., or bringing the whole flock back to the fold, it effected, as indeed Venice had with its usual perspicacity foreseen as its chief possible result, a real and lasting reform of the Church. The history of its preliminaries likewise shows the gradual progress of the great Catholic movement. Leo X. and Clement VII., through personal or interested motives, had opposed the meeting of a Council which Charles V. never ceased to ask for. Clement VII.'s fear of such a Council influenced his policy, caused his ruin, and, maybe, indirectly his death. Pope Farnese had also opposed it. He was apprehensive lest such an assembly should entirely absorb the authority of the Pontiff. He only called it at the repeated instance of the Emperor, whose pressure he dared no longer resist.

Pius IV., though personally little affected by the new ideas which already invaded the whole of the Catholic world, made no resistance.¹ The work was completed under his pontificate. That work was now to be made to bear fruit, and to do this was what his immediate successors considered their most important duty, a duty which they performed to the best of their ability. Could the great ecclesiastical Parliament have been assembled in the midst of the general indifference which in religious matters characterised the Italy of the Renaissance? We may question it. In all probability the repugnance of Leo X., of Clement VII., of Paul III., founded on the general apathy of the public, would have carried the day against the pressing demands of the Emperor. But in the sixteenth century this dislike dwindled away under the pressure of the Catholic opinion, which had become irresistible. How are we to explain why the Popes, who should in their capacity of Heads of the Church have been the promoters of the reaction, were, on the contrary, as regards the Council, the last to follow it? Leo X., Clement VII., and to a certain degree Paul III., were men of their times, of those times which had not seen them reign, but had given them birth, had seen them grow and advance in their career. They were children of the Renaissance, and of that essentially political era of the Papacy. Questions besides specially affecting the interests of their position made them necessarily diffident towards so extreme a party. In every sense it appeared to them to be dangerous that the examination, and, maybe, the solution, of those grave questions which were mooted in the Church should be entrusted to a Council. Would it be possible, asked Paul III., to direct, restrain, and at last dissolve, an assembly composed of so many different elements, a prey to changeable influences, and even accessible to the influence of those sovereign princes whose representatives were to sit in the Council? What would be the result? None could foresee it. But then was it not leaving matters to chance, to place them in the hands of that areopagus, so profoundly to alter the constitution of the Church, or exchange its monarchical for a synodal character? These hesitations had, therefore, a locus standi, and it would be unfair to accuse Paul III. of égotism and lukewarmness, only because he disliked to rush into the unknown, or to expose to risks which he could not measure, those interests of which he was at once the guardian and the receptacle. But in the highest region it was finally felt that a great effort must be made to bring back the dissenters, which already implied negotiations in the future, and to reform the Catholic clergy, which necessarily required their free concourse.

This double object, the reconciliation between Protestants and Catholics, if possible, and the reformation of Catholic existence, could only be obtained by the dangerous but unavoidable means of a Council. This conviction once acquired, all the fears and hence the resistance of the Popes disappeared at once to make way for other feelings. Throwing aside all considerations in respect of person or position, the Popes then headed the reaction, brought to a satisfactory conclusion the business of the Council, insured the execution of its decrees, and, in a word, saved the Church which had been so near its ruin. The wonderful results obtained are to be accounted for by the equally wonderful forces which were gathered almost by a miracle in so short a space of time,¹ by the advantage taken of it, by the energetic measures adopted. The Protestants had adopted equally strong measures, and these contrast powerfully by their severity with the gentle customs of the present day, but were in harmony with those of the age, and answered to the exigencies of the occasion. These results are finally accounted for by the then recognised fact, that the Protestant Reformation had, in the hands of those princes who were its leaders, become an instrument of war and a flag which covered interested projects,² while the Catholic reaction was a purely religious

² There are abundant proofs. We shall only quote here the statement of Girol. Soranzo, Rome, 1563. 'Questi affetti [of the Popes for their nephews] adunque et interessi mondani, che sono stati tanto palesi al mondo, hanno causato che principi temporali, presa occasione di tali esempi e della suscitazione di tanta eresia, hanno pensato di impadronirsi anche loro dei beni della Chiesa; il che non potendosi fare senza alienarsi dall' obbedienza della sede apostolica, ha fatto che essi ne sono in tutto partiti. E per mio credere nell' alienazione della Germania ed Inghilterra ha avuto molto maggior parte il proprio interesse dei principi che la opinione di Martino Lutero e del Melantone; e dei presenti moti di movement, born in the inmost recesses of hearts, and based upon dogmas of faith which are inaccessible to the action of individual reason, the essence and starting point of Protestantism. Ambition, no doubt, played a great part in promoting the movement. The wars of the League, and the favour with which Philip II. honoured it, are so many proofs. Nor was the Protestant camp wanting altogether in religious aspirations, but the two changes, taken all in all, were remarkable for being the one an essentially religious, and the other a political movement — the temporal interests of a limited number of individuals, on the one part; the religious belief of a whole and compact mass of individuals, on the other. All the moral advantages of the fight were on the side of the Church, and her triumph would have been complete had the success of those princes who defended her in the field been equal to the display of her spiritual forces.

Francia sa molto bene la Serenità Vostra che non il Calvino ne il Beza, ma le inimicizie particolari e il desiderio di governare sono state principal cagione.'

CHAPTER V.

THE ROMAN CHURCH AND COURT.

SUCH was, at the death of Gregory XIII., the nature of that religious movement which it is agreed to call the great Catholic reaction, and of which we have attempted to give a slight sketch. Rome was, though not its cradle (for the reaction belongs by birth to every Catholic country), at least the great centre where the flood and ebb tides of the new ideas met. To the head of the Church, residing in Rome, devolved the care of directing, enlightening, and restraining it. The Pope, however, is not only a pontiff, but he is likewise a king. He exercises the temporal power which has been entrusted to him without control, either personally, which is seldom the case, or, as is usual, through ministers freely chosen by him from among the members of the Sacred College. These formerly were members of the Pope's family, or at least compatriots, and ever-faithful executors of his will. Made Pope by an election the results of which cannot be foreseen, and invested with a supreme power which has no political limits, the Pontiff governs the state during a more or less limited space of time, the maximum of which, twenty-five years, has as yet been reached by one Pope only, St. Peter,¹ and the mean of which has been not more than seven years. Nine days after his death, when his body has been deposited in a vault before being removed to one of those rich tombs which make of St. Peter the finest mausoleum in existence, his successor, whose name is known only to Providence, will be elected. Here, again, as in almost all cases, the event will baffle the most scientific plans, belie the most authorised of previsions, and disappoint the hopes and fears which float around the tomb which has only so lately been closed. With the new Pope succeeds a new régime. A change, which is more or less extensive, but ever great since it affects the heads of the administration, takes place in the official world. These changes of sovereigns occur oftener in Rome, and occasion greater modifications in the higher spheres of Government, than anywhere else. Unforeseen issues and want of stability are characteristics of the Roman Government.

To this must be added the fact that the ecclesiastical calling is open to everyone, independent of country, birth, or race, and that it formerly gave access to State as well as to Church employment. 'It is fortunate,' writes Luigi Mocenigo, after noticing, as others had done, the evils to which such a system gave rise, 'that there are no men of sufficiently low birth or condition that cannot reasonably hope, if they embrace the ecclesiastical profession, some day to become a bishop, a cardinal, or even a Pope; and it is even easier for people of humble extraction than for illustrious and noble cardinals to obtain the tiara, for the latter, when they find themselves excluded, prefer, to their equals, some cardinals of obscure birth, and especially so if he has been in their service or in that of their household.' The frequent changes were due to the old age of the several popes. All who had embraced the clerical profession could aspire to every dignity, even the highest, and no one was excluded from that profession. In the conclaves the cardinals who had risen from the people had as much chance as the others of becoming Pope, if not more. The result was that on the very morrow after the election of the new pontiff opinion was rife as to possible results of the future conclave, and each tried to favour his chances, so that Rome became the focus of every ambitious aim, whether it were noble or the reverse.¹ The most precious favour which fate could bestow was to elect as Pope the cardinal whose chaplain or secretary or companion one happened to be.²

What justified in a measure these high aspirations were the numerous examples, whether old or recent, of men having made rapid and brilliant careers. Thus Adrian Florent, the son of an Utrecht mechanic, became successively doctor of divinity, preceptor of Charles V., his governor-general of Spain, a cardinal, and finally Adrian VI. Pius IV. and Pius V. were born, the one of the lower ranks of the middle classes, the other of the people. Gregory XIII. was the son of a small tradesman. We need not speak of earlier Popes who had similar origins. In the same century there sat upon the throne of St. Peter the son of a poor gardener (Sixtus V.), and Ippolito Akdobrandini (Clement VIII.), whom his father, a gentleman and a lawyer of repute, but a poor man, had placed as clerk in a banking-house. As to the cardinals, they were many of them of low birth, and sometimes were in majority of those who could boast an illustrious descent.

¹ Sixtus V. was elected on the 24th of April, and on the 8th of May Cardinal d'Este wrote to M. de Villeroy: 'But as no sooner has a Pope been elected than minds are preoccupied about his successor, I will tell you what I think on the subject.'—Paris, Coll. Harlay, 288.

² Rel. Ven. Luigi Mocenigo, 1560.

‘Rome,’ writes a Venetian envoy, Girolamo Soranzo, in 1563, ‘is beautiful in itself, but especially so by its Court; for it is unquestionably a great thing to see a multitude of people of every nation, of every rank and grade of society, congregate in one city, impelled by the hope which buoys up each man that he will attain his end. The man who is born rich, and who is not satisfied with the honours which he can attain in his own country, may with money arrive at the highest dignities. Another, who is poor and has a large family, selects among his sons the one who gives most promise, and sends him to Rome in the hope of finding for him there an honourable and sufficient living. A third, born in obscurity and in want, who feels that he has some knowledge either of letters or of business, at once proceeds to Rome, and on arrival, depending upon fate as well as upon his intellectual capacities, sets to work and aims at the highest dignities if not the highest honour. Lastly, the man who cares for independence, and requires nothing but what everyone can command, likewise chooses Rome as a residence. This universal concourse, though giving rise occasionally to scandal, owing to the luxury of that Court, which, following the example of the early Fathers, should live apart from such splendour, turns, however, on the other hand, to the advantage of that poor Italy; for it opens many honourable and lucrative professions to many Italian gentlemen who otherwise would not know whom to address, and might possibly have recourse to no one but the Ultramontanes.'

Hence a feverish state which had become normal. All the inconveniences which attach to the elective power, and which were increased in Rome by the frequency of the changes of sovereigns, as well as by the extensive scope which presented itself to the ambition of everyone, are palpable and have often been pointed at. The advantages, however, accruing from such a system have much less often been noticed. The least, perhaps, of these is to have facilitated, as Soranzo writes to the gentlemen of Italy, the means of advantageously occupying their younger sons, at least those among them (and the fact deserves attention) who gave most promise, that is, had most brain and energy. What is more important is that Rome, while it offered such high rewards to merit, and left to fate so wide a scope, attracted from all countries men, who became enrolled in its service (which in reality was that of civilisation), and who brought with them, to that great centre of activity, the share of intelligence, strength, courage, and perseverance which they had received from above. To enumerate the names and the works of those statesmen, churchmen, scholars, and artists which Rome has produced, but who were not born within its walls, would be to write a long page of the history of humanity. It is well known that almost all the artistic treasures of modern times which are accumulated in Rome are due to the munificence of the Popes and cardinals, and to the genius of those foreign artists who owed their celebrity to that exalted stage in the theatre of the world, as it was called, where taste became purified by the study of the antique, where the sacred fire ran no risk of burning out for want of fuel, where emulation was called forth by competition and progress by emulation, and where glory and often riches became the rewards of success, and immortal fame that of superior merit. What would Raphael and Michael Angelo have been without Julius II. and Leo X., had the one never left Umbria or the other Tuscany? Raphael, maybe, would have proved an idealised Perugino, but would never have painted the stanze and the loggie of the Vatican. Michael Angelo, who did great things at Florence but greater still at Rome, would never have painted either his 'Last Judgment' or his 'Moses.'

Rome owes to the double individuality of the Papacy—the spiritual power of which rests upon the immovable basis of the dogmas, and the temporal is so inconstant that it can be likened to the air which one breathes in the City, so frequent are its changes—that peculiar physiognomy which characterises it. At once fixed and movable it recalls those rare heads with strongly marked features and nervous and delicate expression, which, in their constant changeableness, show the activity of mind and the emotions of the soul which are at work. Even the material aspect of the city changes with its pontiffs. Each Pope gives to Rome the print of his weakness or of his strength. Under Paul IV. Rome, for the first time, reflected the great religious change. Under his pontificate began the reform of the morals of the clergy. 'Rome,' says Mocenigo, 'then resembled an honest monastery, wherein whoever wanted to commit a sin had to do so as secretly as possible.' In the higher spheres of the ecclesiastical world scandal had totally disappeared. The floating population had considerably diminished. The Pope's severity acted powerfully upon the idle in making them leave a town which was shorn of its former attractions, and those bishops who preferred life at Court to life in their dioceses were sent back to the latter without delay. Rome had then not more than 50,000 inhabitants. Under the pontificate of Pius IV., who was less severe than his predecessor, the population rose to 70,000. But the old splendour, the riches and luxury of former times, had disappeared. One of the most salutary decisions of the Council of Trent was one prohibiting the bishops and other incumbents to abandon their residence. Another decision put an end to plurality in bishoprics. Prelates became poorer, and foreign bishops could no longer establish themselves in Rome. The Courts of Spain and France, which formerly were so anxious to increase the number of cardinals who were their subjects, now opposed any further promotion. The schism in England and in part of Germany had reduced the number of incumbencies of which the Holy See could formerly dispose. All these causes concurred in operating a change in the aspect of Rome. The Pontifical Court was less brilliant since the bishops and their suites had left the city.¹ There were fewer people and fewer amusements. No wonder that the men of pleasure, diplomatists, cardinals, and old-fashioned prelates deplored what they looked upon as a degeneration. But more clear-sighted or less worldly observers could see in this change one of the great symptoms of the regeneration that was being accomplished in the heart of the Church. 'One lives,' says Mocenigo,² 'very quietly in Rome, either because one is poor, or because one follows the example of Cardinal Borromeo. People are like those who rule them. That cardinal, who has everything in his hands, leads so religious and retired a life, that the cardinals and courtiers can hope for nothing unless they adopt in reality or in appearance his mode of existence. They therefore no longer take any part in any public amusements. Masqued cardinals are no longer seen as of yore. They do not now accompany ladies through the streets of Rome either on horseback or driving. They barely walk out alone or in closed carriages. No more feasts, no more games, no more hunting nor fine liveries, no luxury. This is all the more perceptible that there are no longer here any members of the Pope's family, nor rich and great secular noble-

men, of which there were so many at the Court of Rome in former days. The priests all wear their clerical dress, and the aspect of the men clearly shows the effects of reform.' Carriages—the usage of which had become general since the middle of the century—had become less in vogue since Pius IV. had enjoined his cardinals to come to the Vatican on horseback according to the old custom, which, he said, Charles V., when in Rome,¹ had so much admired. Under Pius V. Rome preserved that austere aspect. That holy Pope took pleasure in erecting monuments to the memory of his departed friends. It was his only distraction.² 'Gregory XIII.,' says Tiepolo (1576), 'though less severe than Pius V., does as well. He takes great care of the churches, builds and restores several, and promotes, with the help of the clergy, the great work of reform. It is fortunate that two pontiffs of such irreproachable lives should have succeeded one another, for by their example everyone has become, or appears to have become, better. The cardinals and prelates of the Court often say mass, live quietly, their household likewise, and the whole town leads a better and incomparably more Christian existence, so that the affairs of Rome in a religious point of view are in a good condition, and not far short of that state of perfection which human weakness allows of our attaining. The throng in the churches on the occasion of this holy year, not only composed of Roman inhabitants but of people belonging to all parts of Italy and of various foreign nationalities, was immense. Whole populations from the villages and even towns of the Pontifical States came to the holy city. Three and four thousand were seen travelling together.¹ One hospital, that of the Trinità dei Monti, where poor pilgrims were harboured for three days, lodged and fed 250,000 people with an admirable order, and without ever wanting more than what money had been collected by the alms for this purpose.' Towards the end of the pontificate, and notwithstanding the troubled state of Europe, the terror which brigandage inspired in Italy, and the weak government of Gregory XIII., Rome regained a little of her old gaiety. 'The Pope is disposed to set the good example,' says Giovanni Cornaro (1581), 'and to exhort the cardinals to live modestly, but without enquiring into their conduct.' And he artlessly adds: 'Rome occupies now a middle place between licentiousness and strict morality, and everyone is all the better for it.'

² 'Circa le fabbriche non si sa ancora quello sia per fare Pio V; ben è vero che sinora non si veggono molti principj, se non fosse un convento di padri dominicani, oltre un sepolcro famosissimo nella chiesa della Minerva per onorar la memoria di Paolo IV suo benefattore e nella chiesa della Trinità de' Monti un'altra cappella per il cardinal Carpi, suo vecchio amico e benefattore, e nel duomo di Napoli un'altra per il cardinal Caraffa nipote di Paolo IV, ed infine piglia tutto il suo piacere fabricar tumuli per quello e per questo.' (Tiepolo, 1569.)

CHAPTER VI.

THE CITY OF ROME.

AT the time of which we are speaking, Rome was no longer what it had been previously to the Protestant reformation which had invaded the North, and the Catholic reform which was being accomplished in the Church. It had not, however, ceased to be the great centre of Europe which from all countries attracted a crowd of foreigners. People went there to embrace orders, or to make a fortune either by placing capital at high interest in the 'monti,' or by buying some lucrative employment. Others went there for the benefit of their souls, and visited the seven Basilicas or prayed at the Tombs of the Apostles. Politics, arts, and sciences equally attracted a number of foreigners. It was the assemblage of every human interest in one city that caused the roads that led to it to be ever thronged with travellers from the month of October until the hot season. Barring the students, these travellers were therefore of three categories,—the ambitious, the capitalists, and the pilgrims. There were no tourists. To travel for the sake of travelling then was much more a labour than a pleasure. Tourism was born in the seventeenth century, and Englishmen were the first to practise it. At the end of the sixteenth century people travelled on business, and perhaps occasionally for health, to go and take the waters. These were more numerous at that time in Italy and more renowned than those in the North, where, however, Karlsbad, Spa, Baden, Vichy, Plombières, already enjoyed a European reputation, and, with the exception of Lucca, were better organised than the Italian bathing places for the reception of travellers. No one travelled for pleasure, and those who might have had so eccentric a taste would not have ventured to acknowledge it. A pleasure trip supposes that which did not exist in the Middle Ages nor even at the epoch of transition into modern times of which we are speaking. There was no security on the roads, no facility of locomotion, no safety in the transmission of letters and money, no good inns. An important and serious motive alone could induce a man to leave his home. The suspicions of the authorities and of the people would have been awakened by an attempt to encounter without motive the perils and fatigue of a long journey. Those who have travelled in countries which are little visited, such as Spain, Portugal, and the East, must remember how incredulous were those among whom they arrived as tourists, and to what ridiculous and sometimes serious embarrassments this incredulity frequently gave rise. Foreigners on arriving at Rome were wont at once to make known the object of their journey thither, to place themselves under the protection of some court personage, and to avoid all appearance of being merely curious men—in other words, adventurers—on whom the awkward vigilance of the police would at once be directed. It may readily be believed that people

thus travelling for a definite purpose paid less attention to the charms of nature than do the tourists of the present day, and visited with less attention the monuments and curiosities of the several countries through which they travelled. Hence most deplorable gaps in the rare letters and descriptions of travels of that epoch. The appreciation of nature, and still more the love of art, existed no doubt, but both sentiments are less apparent in the writings of the period because they were only secondary preoccupations in the mind of a traveller, just as in an historical painting the landscape is but of secondary importance. The habit of describing inanimate nature in writing dates from the seventeenth century only. It coincides with the origin of landscape-painting. They both begin at the same time. It is true that Brill was in vogue at the end of the sixteenth century, but Claude Lorraine and the great Dutch painters began their chefs-d'œuvre, in which, for the first time, figures are but accessories, at the same time that the English, tired of their Whitehall festivities, their country-house comforts, their Bath and Tunbridge Wells monotonous existence, began to visit France, Germany, and Italy, calling it 'the great tour.' The tourist proper, the man of means, the idle man who holds so important a position in modern society, the man of the world and of pleasure, did not exist in the sixteenth century. The upper classes in Italy were much more mixed up in business of all kinds than they are now. Elder sons, unless they took part in the business of the municipality of their native towns, went into the army or into the Church. They served their government, the Pope, the Emperor, Spain and France, sometimes Venice. To this activity some of the greatest names in Italy are indebted to the renewal of a celebrity which is lost in ages gone by. Those Roman barons who lived in their fortified castles outside Rome, and preferred their independence, found the means of practising war on a small scale in the constant opportunities which offered of their quelling rebellion. Many of them became prelates, cardinals, or entered the chivalrous orders of St. John and St. Stephen. In Venice, at Pisa, and at Genoa, it was not derogatory in a nobleman to give himself up to commerce as an ordinary occupation. In Genoa the best families owed their fortune to commercial speculation. Everyone was busy. The idle constituted the exception. The old motto that 'noblesse oblige' (noble birth obliges) not only to live in great style, but also to distinguish oneself, was then fully put into practice. By taking a part in active life, a fresh bloom was given to the faded laurels, a new colour to the old family escutcheon. The inherited dignity which with birth and large landed property forms the essence of nobility, and without which no aristocracy could long maintain itself, was thus perpetuated. Work constituted one of the great elements in the life of each at that time, whereas pleasure and idleness are too often now-a-days the much-to-be-regretted privilege of the higher classes.

If, with the help of documentary evidence of that epoch, we look into the daily life of public men, we cannot but wonder at the activity which was apparent everywhere—in the palaces, in the streets, on the high roads, —and which extended to the numerous followers of the cardinals, envoys, and great lords of the period. The latter took great interest in the arts, less so in the sciences, wrote verses, kept up communications with the chief towns of Italy and principal courts of Europe. Generally speaking, there were constant relations kept up, and a great community of interests existing between the different classes of society. Distinct though these were, they became closely allied by their constant and familiar contact with one another. Of all these centres of activity, Rome was the most important and also the most agitated. Here every nationality congregated: the French, who, following the difficult, and in winter dangerous, passage of Mont Cenis, were fortunate on their way to meet at Susa with a good inn which reminded them for the last time of the habits of their country; the Germans, who came by Trent and the valley of the Adigio; people from Lower Austria, Bohemia, and Silesia; the Hungarians, and the Poles, who travelled by the Ponteba passes or by Ampezzo and Serravalle. That road is now abandoned, but was followed in ancient times by the Romans on their way to Carinthia and the waters of Gastein.

The impressions received by our forefathers were very different from those which we now experience when for the first time we perceive from the last summits of the Alps the clear sky of the South, the bright horizon, the fertile and golden plains of that classical soil of Italy which has been the dream of our youth. Our enthusiasm is intense, and no material preoccupation arrests its progress, certain as we feel that at night we shall find either at Turin or at Milan, at Verona or at Venice, both shelter and food. Such was not the case in the sixteenth century. Tired out, and excited by perils undergone during several days' ride on the brink of Alpine precipices, a traveller reached the gates of an Italian city only to find many more difficulties to arrest his progress. Passports did not exist except as safe-conducts in time of war. But no sooner had a rumour of a contagious illness been spread than from town to town bills of health were asked for, and the town agents made it a pretext to ransom foreigners. Above the doors of each room in the inns were written the words, 'Remember the ticket;' and before being granted admittance, a permit of stay was to be obtained from the magistrates of the town to whom the traveller gave his name and that of his followers. Admittance being obtained, the wearied traveller passed the draw-bridge, and under the vault of a battled gate into the town. Horses could with difficulty get along the slippery and bad pavements. At each step the traveller saw churches, magnificent and neglected palaces, solidly built stone houses, with dark and deserted appearances. Fire and water seemed alike wanting. No one bade them enter and partake of any hospitality. The few and large windows, without panes of glass in them, had shutters or coarse blinds. With few exceptions, all the hotels (locande) were detestable. Northern men, accustomed to strong drinks and to copious repasts, deplored an enforced sobriety. Their eyes were not sufficiently accustomed to works of art to appreciate their beauty, nor the lofty grandeur of the monuments before which they passed. Italy, owing to the rich inheritance bequeathed to her by antiquity, and the still richer conquests which in modern times she has reaped, the living image of the evolutions of the human mind, the cradle of civilisation, and as such our common fatherland, seldom fails to exercise over those who visit her shores, though perhaps not at once, yet after a short stay, a magic and indefinable spell. Travellers then had not reached this point. What a contrast, they exclaimed, with Burgundy, Switzerland, Upper Germany, the countries they had just left. There they felt themselves in a joyous and rich land. What a difference from Bâle and its innumerable fountains ; from Augsburg, the pleasant residence of the Fuggers, the princes of commerce ; or from all those cheerful cities of Suabia, watered by brooks of running clear water, and adorned by pretty gabled houses, coquettishly decorated with escutcheons and painted devices, and perforated with innumerable little windows, which, through bright panes of glass and half-drawn white curtains, gave a glimpse into the interior—at each window a head ; the old grandmother nursing the last-born among her grandchildren ; the patriarch of the family with his fur cap, young girls with smiles on their lips and a spindle in the hand. Their freshness and their colour, their carefully netted hair, their engaging appearance, were pleasanter to remember than to look at the classic profile, the dull complexion of the Italian women, and to mark their reserved manners towards foreigners. On approaching the door of those hospitable houses, a grateful smell ever engaged the appetite, for the prosperous people of Suabia devoted at least three or four hours to the smallest of their repasts. The newly invented spring-spit,¹ which according to Montaigne had but one fault, that of drying meat too much, was seldom at rest in every hall before an enormous fire. With such reminiscences the traveller entered the first Italian town he arrived at and which, as Montaigne says, was 'not very pleasant and had lost all the charms of Germany.'²

But these regrets were not always reasonable. If we except certain material enjoyments for which the people of the South have ever shown a noble contempt, and the fashions which came from Spain, Italy was still at the head of civilisation. With respect to the commodities of life, rapid communications, good roads, luxury of habits, and refinement of manners, no nation equalled her. In proof of this assertion we need only read what the Italian travellers say who visited Germany, France, Spain, and Poland. The Venetian envoys at the court of Henry III. of France, glory in having for the love of their country undergone the perils and difficulties of so long a journey. Those who travelled through Spain literally ran the risk of dying of hunger in the uninhabitable plains of old Castile, or of dying of cold in the snows of the Sierras. Chevalier Guarini, who was alternately a courtier, a poet, and secretary to the Dukes of Ferrara, Urbino, and Ferdinand of Tuscany, and is the somewhat too much praised author of the 'Pastor Fido,' on being sent to Poland by Alphonso II. to congratulate Henry III., took the way of Ampezzo and Kreuzberg, and gave, in a letter to his family, a most sorrowful account 'of the rudeness of men and things, of the dearness of horses, of the want of food and objects of primary necessity;' from Vienna to Warsaw he was not 'carried, but dragged, jolted, murdered, in carts which defy description.'

Of the several routes which led to Rome from the north of Italy, those of Bologna, Florence, Sienna, Viterbo, and of the Adriatic coast were most frequented. Towards the end of the fifteenth century and at the commencement of the sixteenth, the court of Urbino, called the Athens of Italy (Itala Atena), which was then one of the centres of fashion and a school of arts and sciences, attracted many foreigners of note. To enjoy the liberal hospitality of Duke Frederick, of his wife, the celebrated Battista Sforza, who was always surrounded by a crowd of youthful beauties, of Guidobaldo I., and of Francesco Maria della Rovere, the friend and patron of Raphael, people left the shores of the Adriatic at Pesaro, where in winter the ducal family resided, and got to Urbino across the mountain. Urbino is situated on one of the projecting cliffs of the Apennines, and possessed the most gorgeous palatial residence, the finest structure not of a religious character which the Renaissance had produced. It was finished in 1476. Its fine proportions, its long suites of rooms, the richness and finish of the sculptured doors and windows, had at the time of its building excited universal admiration. Since that time the Court of Urbino had lost much of its splendour, and the road which led to it was abandoned as it is now.¹ Thus the most cheerful, picturesque, and in point of art one of the richest spots in Italy became, comparatively speaking, a terra incognita. Its poetical landscapes can be traced in the backgrounds of the works of Raphael, Perugino, and all the old masters of Umbria.

The 'maremme,' that part of the Mediterranean which washes the shores of Italy between Cecina and Corneto, which has been rendered healthy and habitable in our times only, thanks to the great works ordered by the Grand-Duke Leopold, was then but one immense and continuous marsh, covered with impenetrable copses,² the refuge of the wild boars, which, as in Dante's time, 'detest cultivated spots.' Cultivation was and is still scarce there. A mean-looking population inhabited some miserable huts perched in the interior of the land on the ridge of mountains. Fever carried them off, and made havoc among the troops who on the borders of the sea garrisoned Orbitello and other presidencies for the King of Spain. Travellers fled from such deserted and pestilential places.

The pilgrims, who since the Catholic reaction had become very numerous, generally took the route by Florence and Sienna, returning from Rome by Loretto, where the sanctuary erected to Our Lady more than ever attracted a crowd of pious people, and, unfortunately, as many pickpockets, mendicants, and robbers.

² Copse. The author has made apparently a French word of the Italian 'macchia' a spot, and, as applied in the present case, an impenetrable small wood or copse. (Note of the translator.)

The roads were generally good in Upper and Central Italy, and might be used by carriages during most of the year, with the exception of the Apennine Pass. In winter the progress of a vehicle was often stopped by torrents from the mountain, over which no bridge had as yet been thrown. Gregory XIII., the Grand-Duke of Como, and Emmanuel Philibert had understood the importance of easy and rapid communications. To them Italy is indebted for stone bridges, and roads (wide enough for carriages) planned according to scientific rules, and properly kept. The draining of the marsh at Ravenna, the construction of the road from Rome to Loretto and Ancona, which inscriptions on marble slabs called the 'Via Buoncompagna;' the bridge of Centino on the road to Florence, and other similar works, are due to Gregory XIII. Tuscany began to be covered with roads, and strangers admired the solidity and graceful structure of the bridges which were being erected everywhere. The Milanese were already masters of the art of drainage and of cutting canals. Naples and Sicily, and perhaps also, but to a less degree, the ever-neglected continental portion of the Venetian Republic, constituted the least advanced provinces in Italy.

The custom of travelling in carriages had not yet been adopted. It became general only towards the latter years of the sixteenth century. That luxury, which became exaggerated in the seventeenth century, was only just then beginning. The Duke of Ferrara first set the example; and when, in 1581, he went to Padua with four hundred carriages to meet the Empress, widow of Maximilian, the State of Venice was not the only one to be scandalised. Twenty or thirty years after, however, every prince, and, following their example, all those who belonged to the higher classes, did nearly the same, and then it was that to indulge in the luxury of horses, carriages, houses, and furniture became the common rule.

In the time of Gregory XIII. people travelled generally on horseback. The drivers, for they were already so called, furnished horses at prices which varied according to circumstances, but which, considering the comparative value of money then, seem to have been much what they were during the first half of the present century.¹

¹ A traveller's ordinary daily expenses were reckoned at 5 pence for one meal, 10 pence for board and lodging, 15 pence for the hire of a horse, all expenses included: in all 25 pence, or 50 French sous, which were equal to six Spanish reales or as many juliiuses. A julius or paul, Roman coin, so called after Popes Julius II. and Paul III. were then worth 5 sous of French money. A journey from Rome to Naples usually cost 5½ ducats a head, the driver having to see to everything, and find lodgings and food. In posting the traveller had often reason to complain of the exactions of the postmasters, who sometimes required 4 reales or 10 pence per horse and per post, which was considered to be an exorbitant price. People travelled forty and forty-five miles a day (a mile being the $\frac{1}{3}$ of a degree). Drivers also took charge of luggage for Rome. This they transported in carts, which took twenty days to reach from either Milan or Venice, at a price of two baiocchi a league; ten days from Florence or Ancona. Calling to mind what the means of communication were forty years ago, that is before the institution of 'diligences,' which existed only in the Austrian provinces (the mail or courier-chaise only took one passenger), we find that, until the very recent introduction of railways, and the immense changes thus effected, no noticeable progress had taken place in the facilities for travelling in Italy since the days of Gregory XIII. With respect to treatment and prices in towns there existed great irregularities. It was very inferior to the treatment of Southern Germany and Switzerland, but food was cheaper by one-third of the price, and the prices were nearly those asked in France. The best hotels

Postal communications were slow but regular. An 'ordinary' postman left Rome once a week for Lyons and Paris, passing through Florence and Milan. Letters reached Lyons in ten and Paris in fifteen days. Another ordinary service was established between Milan, Coire, and the west of Germany. The Venetian post, of which that State had the control, left the Venetian Palace in Rome once a week, and arrived in Venice on the fourth day. A postal service was kept up with the Marches by the Pontifical Government. Letters for Ascoli and Fermo reached their destination on the tenth and eleventh days. The communications with Madrid by means of the Lyons courier were often interrupted by the military events of which the south of France was the theatre. The Genoese, and hence the Barcelona route was preferred.

Besides the letter-post, there were also the post horses, which could be used only with a special were at Rome and in Venice, the two most frequented towns. In the latter city there was besides no need for horses or servants. Gondoliers did the business of the house. A gondola with one man cost 17 French sous, 8½ pence a day of twenty-four hours, and Venetian prices resembled those of Paris. Padua was celebrated for its cheap living. Many foreigners, and especially French noblemen, resided there. The latter attended the fencing and dancing and tennis classes, which were very celebrated at that time. There were excellent boarding-houses for foreigners, the price for which came to 7 scudi for a gentleman and 5 for his valet a month, everything included, except fire and lighting. Travellers complained much of the want of comfort and cleanliness, as well as of the dearth of the Florence inns, which was all the more felt as there were no boarding-houses. At the 'Angel,' which was the best hotel in the town, a gentleman had to pay 7 reales, or 35 sous, for himself, and 4 reales (20 sous) for his valet and the forage for his horse, which was a much higher price a day (25½ pence) than what was asked in Paris or even in Venice. In the other cities of Tuscany, living was very cheap. At Lucca the hotels were small, but well furnished.

permission from the various Governments to which they belonged, and on condition of going full tilt. By this means the Archduke of Austria, Ferdinand of Tyrol, was able to reach Rome from Inspruck in six days, when summoned to the Conclave after the death of Gregory XIII.

If both postal services were deficient, that of the diplomatic correspondence was perfectly organised. The envoy's couriers were important personages. Armed to the teeth, and known by the arms of their country, which they wore on the breast, they often had encounters with the 'sbirri' of the towns through which they passed; with the 'banditti,' who plundered in accordance with all the rules of the art; with the 'assasini,' who were common brigands but not in a band; with the 'malandrini,' who were peasants at one time and robbers at another, digging the ground at one moment and seizing what they could at the next. The archives of the Venetian embassy in Rome are full of reports giving accounts of acts of brigandage out of which these couriers came either as heroes or as victims, and in which the 'faccia' a terra' already played its traditional part. The Venetian couriers, passing through Gualdo and Nocera, took forty-five hours from Rome to Venice. The direct train takes twenty-four hours. The French got to Paris in nine days. The Emperor's couriers reached Prague in nine or ten. One of the latter bet he could go the distance in seven days. The Grand-Dukes of Tuscany, Cosmo and Francis, spared no expense to let the Emperor have by the swiftest couriers the latest news from Rome. The commercial travellers belonging to the firm of Fugger were ever to be met on the road, like those of the Rothschilds now-a-days. The Courts of Germany and Spain sometimes turned them to account. Messengers generally took twenty days to get over, at full speed, the distance between the capital of Bohemia and Spain. The ambassadors of Philip II. in Rome could not hold periodical intercourse with their Government in Madrid, owing to the political state of France and the irregularity of water communications, the seas being infested with corsairs. They never expected an answer before three months. Measuring distances, therefore, by the time which it then took to get over them, Madrid was as far from Rome as Calcutta and Madras are from it now-a-days; and Paris and Prague were about as distant then as Washington is now, and Warsaw as is Rio Janeiro. We have taken no account of the electric communications which in a measure have triumphed over time and space. If we make so trite an observation, it is only in order to be able to judge better of the merits of diplomacy at that time. We should bear in mind how the possessions of each great rival Power, not so well defined as now, could be encroached upon in every direction, thus multiplying the causes of quarrel, whilst the seats of government were divided by enormous distances. Cabinets were thus obliged, in the instructions which they sent, to foresee all possible issues, and their ministers or agents abroad were often under the necessity of assuming a great and heavy responsibility; while both were obliged to practise the difficult but important art of waiting until matters had ripened. Foresight, courage, and patience had to compensate for the absence of rapid communications; but fate and accidents naturally played a greater part then than they do now. On the other hand, statesmen were not, as now, compelled to act upon the impulse of the moment, and to undertake serious responsibilities on the mere summary and incomplete indications of the telegraph. Although this mode of accelerated correspondence did not exist at that time, yet, at the time of the Conclave the agents of the Grand-Duke of Tuscany contrived, by means of signals prepared to that effect, to transmit the name of the new Pope most rapidly to their master. Since the landing of the Turks at Otranto in 1480, numberless isolated towers had been built along the coast of the Adriatic, the ruins of which are still visible. Their use was to watch the movements of the corsairs. These were signalled from tower to tower by means of fires, and so well was this service organised that a warning given at the other end of the Peninsula, at Brindisi, or at Cape Leucate, reached Venice in the space of an hour.

Travellers, whom we suppose to be Germans or French (for Spaniards generally came by sea, and Englishmen as yet seldom travelled), generally avoided meeting with pilgrims. The latter journeyed on foot, and in more or less numerous bands, holding a long stick, wearing a hat with a large brim and shells on the shoulder, singing their prayers and asking for alms; some of them (and the author of 'The Following of Christ' says that few are sanctified by long pilgrimages) marauding on the way. Travellers dreaded still more the foreign mercenaries in the pay of Italian princes—men belonging to all nations, and having the reputation of being very bad characters: the Germans, said to be shocking Lutherans, waging war against holy pictures and laughing at the mass; the Gascons, only to be dreaded by the weaker sex; the Italians, bad soldiers but excellent thieves; the Swiss, drunkards;¹ the Spaniards, proverbially cruel.

Mendicants and vagabonds exposed their disgusting infirmities, and persecuted the passers-by in the streets of a town with their importunities. Each town had its court of miracles, which was a centre of misery and crime. There were the 'bianti' (the devout), who sold false dispensations; the 'bordoni' (false pilgrims), who pretended that they were going to Rome, to Loretto, or to St. James of Compostello; and the 'allacrimanti' (false penitents); the 'reliquari,' who sold spurious relics; the 'vergognosi' (the poor who were ashamed to beg); the 'attremanti,' the 'cocchini,' the 'admirati,' the 'affarfanti,' and many other specialties of that vagrant life which was already so thoroughly organised. The sharpers of that day were not behind those of the present time. What was wanted was a good police administration. Sometimes, in consequence of a razzia, summary and prompt punishment was inflicted by order of the municipality ; but in general the swindlers enjoyed great impunity. The next evil to be avoided was falling in with banditti, the curse of the Peninsula, but especially of the Roman States. These were far more obnoxious to the natives than to travellers, for, with timely notice, the latter could avoid the threatened locality. The reader will soon see what an important part brigandage played, and what efforts Sixtus V. had to make in order to deliver Italy from this scourge.

Let us suppose that our travellers have journeyed through Savoy—which is not thickly peopled, and is studded with small villages often composed of nothing but the lord's manor and his servant's hut—and have passed through Turin, without stopping there. Disregarded on account of its dull and cold climate, Turin then presented no attractions. Of all the Italian towns it is in its present form the most modern, and has most changed for the better. Montaigne speaks with contempt of that small town, 'situated in a space much surrounded by water ; neither well built, nor agreeable, though a river crosses it and carries away its filth.' What a difference, according to him, from Milan, the most populous town of Italy, a big city full of workmen and merchants ! It resembles Paris, and has some likeness to French towns. It has not the fine palaces of Rome, Naples, Genoa, and Florence, but surpasses them in point of grandeur ; and the number of foreigners who visit Milan is not less great than that of those who go to Venice. Notwithstanding the wealth of its inhabitants and of its nobility, Milan had a provincial appearance. Its political existence had ceased. People copied the fashions of Madrid. Seven hundred Spaniards constituted the garrison, and the fort was well mounted with guns.

Verona, which had fallen into decay, and was little peopled since it passed under the domination of Venice, called the attention of the traveller to its amphitheatre. The State had ordered it to be repaired, and tournaments were held there. Sixty men, whose mission was to keep the peace among a population for which the Government cared little, occupied the castle. Next to the 'Bear' in Rome, the inns of Venice, and the 'Post' Hotel at Piacenza, the 'Little Horse' Inn at Verona was considered the best hotel in Italy.

Vicenza owed its reputation to the beauty of its position and to its palaces, the most recent of which were the work of Palladio, who died there in 1580, and who, next to Vignola, was the most celebrated architect of the day. A visit also to the Convent of the Gesuates,¹ to make a provision of 'naffe' water, was indispensable.

Padua was already what it continues to be—a dull, monotonous, and deserted city. Its university attracted many students, but they were all Italians. The ultramontanes, who were so numerous in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, had long ceased to go there. Its fencing masters were much in renown.

Following the Brenta, which was adorned on both banks for a distance of twenty miles with gardens,

terraces, and villas, which are mostly the same that we now see, but were then properly kept, richly furnished, and filled with pictures and works of art of all kinds, travellers got to the lagunes. Aquatic birds mingling their cries with the measured beating of the oar, together with the chime, tempered by distance, of the thousand indefatigable bells of Venice, alone interrupted the solemn and profound silence which reigned over this extensive sheet of water. Its surface, on which played a thousand colours, and which oscillated in its own immoveableness, reflected a whole archipelago of little islands, covered with habitations, convents, and churches, with slightly inclined spires—the result of the action of centuries. In the background a clear line, with a row of red arrows rising above it, and the basilica of St. Mark crowning the whole, presented itself to view; and on the horizon, while leaving the spectator to guess what curve the Adriatic would take, the disappearing ridges of the Alps could be traced. In another hour or so the traveller reached the city of wonders, situated in the centre of that august republic, which, though already politically fallen from the rank among the first Powers which it had occupied at the outset of the century, was materially and socially at the zenith of its grandeur. Nations and States are like individuals. Rest comes after work, a halt after the march which had constituted progress, and down the hill after going up. Then only do peoples, like individuals, fully enjoy the fruits of past labours. In the eyes of the multitude those nations seem most powerful which have already passed the meridian of their strength. Such was the case with Venice, then entering that phase in which a man lives upon his past reputation. No one in the Republic could guess that the fall was at hand. The Venetians were satisfied, and foreigners coming to visit their town were 'struck with admiration.'¹ The statesmen of the Republic alone, because they were more clear-sighted, betrayed in their intimate conversations with one another the fear that the fall was near.

It would be difficult, if not impossible, to form a correct idea of Venice as it existed then. Can a picture painted after death, by an artist who had never seen the original, be a true likeness? Does not such a task imply an effort of imagination which surpasses all human power, since it involves the re-investment of an inanimate body with that life which has gone, and the hiding from the view the greatest of contrasts, that which exists between life and death? During the last two centuries the Republic of St. Mark has died out gradually and naturally. It was dead before it was killed, dead for ever, since in politics there is no resurrection. The Venice that we know, and which recalls by her physiognomy the sweets and bitters of her past history, attractive though she still is, notwithstanding the deadly paleness which hangs over her noble features, is no longer anything but a corpse. We will not try, by galvanic processes, to make her appear under a false semblance of life before the eyes of the reader. Let us, however, hear what some contemporary writers have said of her.

Montaigne looks upon her police organisation, her situation, her arsenal, the Piazza of St. Mark, and the number of foreigners within her walls, as the most remarkable points about her. Nothing could better characterise Venice than the order in which these points are noted. The police, which had already gained the chief position in the administration, shows clearly a falling off, not in the people so much as in those who governed them. It had its hand in everything, suspected everyone, watched everybody and over everything, but could shut its eyes provided no one touched upon politics—that privilege of a few, which belonged to certain classes which an artificial but insurmountable barrier separated from the rest of the citizens. As to situation, Venice lay in the midst of inaccessible lagunes. Her arsenal ever guaranteed to the Republic its position as a great maritime Power, and, a hundred years later, was to furnish it with the means of ending gloriously, by a second conquest of the Morea, the long series of brilliant exploits that had illustrated her history. The Piazza di San Marco was the heart of the city, which was the heart of the Republic. The number of foreigners gave Venice the character of a cosmopolitan centre, of a link between the West and the East, of the rendezvous of the idle and the busy, in search the one of pleasures and the other of gain. Pleasures! They were easily found, and numerous in character, under a rule the severity of which now appeared only in its decrees against luxury, which no one obeyed. The gondola alone was obedient. Daily did this gently-rocked coffin become more and more the symbol of the destinies of the Republic. The women of the aristocracy condescended to wear a very transparent black veil over their rich coloured gowns, but merely, as Sansovino gives us to understand, to enhance the beauty of their complexion, and by no means in obedience to the edicts of the Patres Conscripti. 'One cannot say,' writes the same author, 'which to admire most, the richness of the stuffs or the fineness of the embroidered linen, which is prepared and braided with infinite art. One sees nothing but silk or cloth of gold and silver, not to speak of lace, that wonder of the needle, which is unequalled by anything in other countries.' The patrician women were conspicuous also by the necklaces of pearls of unsurpassed size which they wore, the results of a long-standing connexion with the East, with Ormuz on the Persian Gulf, and all those fabulous countries with which for centuries Venice alone could trade, and where, alas! she now came in contact with the Spaniards and the Portuguese. The ladies used and abused their fans. They knew by chemical preparations, of which the secret is apparently lost, how to give to their hair that golden hue which is so much admired in the women of Titian, of Palma Vecchio, and of all those Venetian masters who could paint with golden rays. Shoes were of an exaggerated height. To this custom, which prevented the fashionable ladies from walking without help, the 'cavalieri servanti,' who were entitled by right to the honour of offering them the hand on feast-days and out walking, owed the origin of their fortune and their social position. The type survived the red heel and the Republic.¹ Contrary to the usages of Germany, of France, and of the rest of Italy, the men who did not inhabit the continent of Venice never wore swords at their sides. They dressed as foreigners, that is, as Spaniards, and only put on the Venetian long robes on public occasions.

The official feasts, the Doge's processions, the solemn rejoicings in which the corporations of art and trade, as well as the common people, took a part, and to which the German colony never failed to contribute fireworks and the illumination of its 'fondaco,' or warehouse, still continued, but the fashionable world no longer attended them. The aristocratic families saw more and more of each other. Small circles were formed, and they were wont to meet (si riducono) in private houses, or in small apartments let for the purpose. Hence the name of ridotti, which has erroneously been translated by redoubt. Married women alone could attend these meetings. Young girls were condemned to absolute retirement, and could never appear at them. Betrothed persons could see each other only when about to be married. Foreigners of distinction were invited to these ridottis, but never the ambassadors. For fear of being suspected, every Venetian gentleman shunned the contact of a diplomatist. At official feasts the Doge received the diplomatic body and the aristocracy of the land in the great Council

Hall, which was lighted by sixty torches, applied to the walls or planted in the ceiling. The Doge's wife was seated on a platform, having on her right the wives of the ambassadors and on her left the ladies of her family. The other ladies were seated on small benches. The men walked about. Dancing went on before and after supper, and until daybreak. At an appointed hour the buffet, which consisted of a variety of sugary substances made to imitate statues, or animals, or old temples, was brought in procession to the Piazza di San Marco by the apprentices of the different trades, and was thus exposed to the admiration or criticism of the people. The great canal was the theatre of other amusements which were no less brilliant. When the 'Bucentaur,' with the Doge on board, appeared, the gondolas, the 'palischermi,' and the numberless skiffs that followed, got into inextricable confusion. At other times large rafts were wont to convey a ball-room painted by Paul Veronese or by Jacopo Sansovino. Across the open arches the fashionable world appeared, and often more than a hundred young women, richly adorned, were seen dancing to the sounds of the music which followed them in gondolas. Lines from Ariosto or from Tasso, whose poem, barely published, had already become popular, were sung, and certainly the 'freschi' and choruses of the 'pillori' of now-a-days give but a faint idea of these past splendours.

The aristocracy had maintained the old custom of open-air conversations. Every morning they met near the ducal palace or at the Rialto. After exchanging polite salutations, they used to spend several hours in discussing the events of the day, with all due caution, however, and, says Sansovino, 'to the satisfaction of those who have business with the nobles, since they can easily see them at fixed times, and to the astonishment of foreigners, who often avail themselves of this opportunity to see the aristocracy.' In winter they did the same in the evening, before going to the private reunions. These conversazioni were looked upon as a superior school for the sons of noblemen who were to be called some day to fill high positions in the State.

No other capital in Europe had the rich appearance, the vivacity, and animation peculiar to Venice. The churches, the palaces were admired ; so were the shops, which were spread throughout the city, even in lanes and under the porticoes as well as at the furthest parts of the town. Each street had thus the appearance of a separate city. Strangers wondered at the brilliant whiteness of the window-panes, that came from the manufacture of Murano. Sansovino notices with pride that not only the palaces and houses belonging to the rich, but every house, even the smallest and humblest, had glass windows, and that the oil-skin cloths of other towns were unknown in Venice. Every Italian prince had a palace there. The Duke of Ferrara had his at San Jacopo d'Orio, the Duke of Urbino on the great canal, close to the Vendramino Palace ; the Duke of Milan at San Michele, and this property subsequently became that of the Mocenigo family. The most admired among the new palaces were those of Correr de la Ca Grande, Balbi, Stürmer, and the Post Office, which were almost all designed by Jacopo Sansovino and Scamozzi. The first among the old palaces built in the Tudesque or Gothic style was the Foscari Palace, filled with the works of Titian. The beautiful view which may be enjoyed from its windows had caused it to be selected as a residence for Henry III. The richest and most renowned on account of its splendid furniture was the Loredano Palace, which dates from the Crusades, but has fallen now-a-days to the rank of an inn. Many houses had frescoes, some by Paul Veronese, others by Pordenone, all now effaced; a great many also by Tintoretto. The interior of these palaces was like a museum. The glories of a family were preserved for succeeding generations by the pencils of the greatest masters. The Morosini Palace is the only one which, by immortal works, can now give an idea of that intimate and living connexion which existed between politics and the arts, between the civil and the military elements.

Manners at this time showed a strange mixture of austerity and licentiousness, which recalled the Middle Ages, and foreboded the Regency. The State seemed to enlist with equal ardour in its service both the virtues and the follies of its citizens. Not only did the courtesans, who were all registered at the Police of the Council of Ten, enjoy a European reputation for beauty and luxurious tastes; but sage magistrates could, without giving scandal, indulge their passions in the face of the whole world.¹ The supposed mysteries of Venice are an invention which served as a conventional veil complacently thrown over the sometimes irregular proceedings of a neighbour. The mask and Venetian mantle hid nothing, but gave a right to be looked upon as incognito. Nowhere was life more open or yet so easy, for attention could be as easily diverted as the people of Venice can cross their narrow streets without elbowing each other. It is, however, time for our supposed travellers to tear themselves away from the seductive attractions of the Queen of the Adriatic, and to resume their road to Rome.

No French gentleman failed at Ferrara to pay his respects to Duke Alphonso. Court carriages drove him to the palace, where a chamberlain introduced him to the Duke, who received him standing and uncovered. He never failed to say that he was the much obliged servant of the 'very Christian' king. Ferrara lacked animation. There were many palaces, but few shops. Life altogether departed when the Court left, and grass soon began to grow in her large and straight-lined streets when she ceased to be the residence of the Dukes of Este.

Bologna was larger and more peopled than Ferrara, but more agitated and anxious in appearance, for the old factions had not died away. The Pepoli faction was the strongest, the most turbulent, and the one which least obeyed the authority of the Pope's legate, until, a little later, the head of that house was punished by the intrepid Sixtus V. The town was famous for its inclined tower, its huge statue of Neptune by John of Bologna, its porticoes, and its cheapness, which equalled that of Padua. But the statue of Neptune then commanded in Italy the greatest and perhaps somewhat exaggerated admiration. Foreigners were amazed on seeing it.¹ Nothing is more curious than to collect the various criticisms made at different epochs in regard to works of art. The history of taste, had it ever been attempted, would have shown that those generations which create works are almost always unjust towards the preceding generations, are much taken with themselves, very exclusive, and ingenuously convinced that they have realised the ideal in the beautiful. Those, on the contrary, that reproduce, imitate, and supply by eclecticism their deficiency in creative power, are far more liberal in spirit and enlightened in mind. Their judgment is impartial and generally just. Such is, it cannot be doubted, the case with our own times. But the more productive generations of former times succeeded one another, each condemning its immediate predecessor; and taste, going constantly from one extreme to another, was necessarily periodically changed. At the end of the sixteenth century, the works of the Renaissance were little appreciated, and the Giraud Palace in Rome, one of the finest works of Bramante, was then considered (who would believe it?) as ordinary and dull-looking. Montaigne and his contemporaries see 'nothing very remarkable either inside or outside' of the once justly celebrated ducal Palace of Urbino. A hundred years ago the Church of St. Ignatius was looked upon as the finest in Rome, and the portal of the Sciarra Palace on the Corso as the eighth wonder of the world. It was put on a par with the Vatican and the Obelisk. The people believed it to be of one stone. Travellers, on arrival, at once let their friends know that they had seen and admired it. It should also be noticed that the Neptune at Bologna was finished in 1564, under the patronage of Charles Borromeo, then the Pope's legate there. Though a priest, a prince of the Church, and a saint, he did not scruple nor show any dislike to promote the erection of a colossal statue representing a divinity of antiquity, and destined to be, notwithstanding its nudity, exposed to the public gaze.¹ What would now-a-days be thought of a bishop who would ornament the enclosure before his cathedral with a statue of Neptune? Fashion was still faithful to mythology, and the Catholic movement of which the cardinal was one of the heroes, though already victorious on the religious side, and fighting strenuously against the science of the Renaissance, had not yet attacked the arts, which were still impregnated with the spirit of modern paganism bequeathed to it by the preceding century. One generation more, and the reaction had reached the artistic sphere, and had enlisted on its side the Dominicans, and such great masters of a new school as Guido Reni, Guercino, and Ribera.

Having crossed the Apennines, our travellers entered Tuscany, and approached Florence with a certain degree of emotion, from which no one can refrain on seeing for the first time that privileged land, where the language spoken by the people reminds one of the classical diction of those who created the Italian language, where the progress of centuries is marked at each step by some masterpiece, where everything breathes refinement, elegance, polish, taste, and the pleasures of the intellect, and where the beauties of nature enhance the greatness of the works of man.

Florence was always considered the most beautiful town in Italy, but political life had left it. Instead of exhibiting all the luxury of former times, or spending enormous sums in building, the great families lived quietly either in their palaces or in those country villas which crown the surrounding heights. To escape the notice of the Government, whose avarice and arbitrary proceedings they knew too well, they hid their wealth. The terrorism introduced by Cosmo de' Medici was continued, though in a modified degree, and without being acknowledged even by those who were the victims of it, under Francis. His foreign policy was deceit, his home government brutal force. The only moral tie which existed between the Duke and his late republican subjects was bodily fear. The middle and lower classes suffered less by the new state of things, but they were burdened with taxes. These were levied on marriage contracts, sales, purchases, objects of primary necessity, upon meat, exchange, the produce of the land, imported goods—in fact, upon everything. A visible torpor had succeeded to the old animation. The luxury of horses, for which

Florence had been noted, no longer existed. The arts and the sciences were in a similar state of dulness. The two fashionable artists, Bartolomeo Ammanati and Giovanni, said to be of Bologna, but a native in reality of Douai, worked for the Court. The one was completing the Uffizi of Vasari, and the courtyard of the Pitti Palace, intending to continue the style of Brunelleschi, but unable to obtain the simple elegance displayed in the 'facade' of the same palace. The statue of Cosmo, worked by Giovanni, already adorned the ducal piazza. Of the various branches of industry, that of silk manufacture was alone advancing. The fine stuffs known as 'rascia' were exported all over Europe and even to the West Indies.¹

Strangers hastened to admire the 'Night' of Michael Angelo, who had died only a few years before, but whose name had already acquired the prestige which must outlive all the changes of fashion. After San Lorenzo, the next visit was to the Cathedral, which called for no special attention; then to the celebrated fountains of the pleasure-grounds of Pratolino and Castello, which, with the artificial water-falls and fountains of the Villa d'Este, near Tivoli, and of Bataglia, near Padua, were the delight of the people of that day.

The higher classes having, from motives of prudence, secluded themselves from the world, the Court absorbed all attention, and replaced, or endeavoured to replace, by its animation, that of which it had deprived the country. Strangers were taken to see the Grand-Duke's two palaces, his stables, and his extensive menagerie.

¹ In 1576 more than two million scudi's worth of these stuffs was exported.

Following the practice of almost every Court at that time, the public was allowed to be a spectator of the sovereign's repast. In the dining hall and at the upper end of the table could be seen the celebrated Bianca Capello,¹ whose full and great beauty, as well as her proud demeanour, called forth the admiration of the looker-on, having on her left Duke Francis, a swarthy, stumpy-looking man, rather below the middle height, with thick limbs, no distinction of manner, but exceedingly polite, his hat in his hand and the smile ever on his lip whenever he passed along the crowd of courtiers that thronged his paths. The picture of health, he seemed to be forty years of age. Opposite the Duchess, whenever he was in Florence, for he generally lived in Rome, sat a handsome man, with a noble though harsh and unprepossessing countenance, tall and graceful, and wearing the purple gown rather with military ease than ecclesiastical becomingness. This was Cardinal Ferdinand of Medici, the brother and presumptive heir of Francis, variously the friend, the confidant, and the adversary of the Duchess. When at Rome, Bianca often used to write to him, to open her heart to him, and give him the minutest details respecting her life and her health.² The lookers-on noted every phase of the repast, admired the Duke's sobriety, noticed how much water he mixed with his wine, nor did they fail to remark that the

² The original correspondence exists in the state archives at Florence.

Duchess did not follow his example. To this subject the gravest men of the day seldom failed to allude, even in their official correspondence. The Pope's repasts are mentioned and described in the diplomatic reports. Cardinal d'Este, when writing to Paris, in a moment of spite, most unfairly taxes Sixtus V. with being more lively and expansive after than before supper; and Pasquier praises Henry III.'s ambassador in Rome, M. de Pisany, for being 'one of the wisest gentlemen he knew, since he drank neither water nor wine nor any other beverage.'¹

The time to visit Florence was on the day of St. John. Strangers and peasants, led by their curates, crowded to the capital; peasant women and numerous monks, with large-brimmed straw hats, such as were made in Florence then. For several days the town wore an appearance of gala. Processions took place, when St. Francis was exhibited, showing his stigmata; and St. George was paraded, fighting the dragon that sends fire from his mouth. These were held alternately with races of 'barberi' and empty chariots. Bianca and the Grand-Duke appeared on a balcony. At one of these races, Strozzi's chariot seemed to have the advantage over that of the sovereign, whereupon everyone applauded, and, though the victory was undecided, the people insisted on the prize being given to Strozzi. This significant demonstration alarmed the nobles, who were always the first to feel the rigour of their master's hand. The fêtes ended on the eve of St. John, by the homage ceremony of the Sienna people and the grand illumination of the cupola of the Cathedral. That day, the only one during the year, the young girls of the nobility and the middle classes could go into the streets and appear in public. Towards night, the Grand-Duke ascended a platform erected against the walls of his palace, which were hung with rich stuffs. The Pope's Nuncio sat on his left. The envoy from Ferrara stood at a respectful distance.¹ Then began the marching past. Young men, representing Sienna and its dependencies, and carrying the colours of its respective towns and villages, badly mounted on small horses or mules, passed one by one before the grand-ducal tribune, and as each was announced by a herald, he offered to the Grand-Duke, in the midst of general hilarity, either a silver goblet or a flag. Such proceedings were wanting in dignity, and far more resembled a masquerade than a state ceremony. A pyramid raised upon a huge car followed the cavalcade. Children, representing angels, sat on the steps, and a man fixed to the summit with an iron bar was intended to represent St. John. The listlessness of the performers and the irreverent behaviour of the spectators showed the feeling of the people, who cared little for the Medici.

If the capital, however, still trembled under the hold of its new masters, the country was quiet and prosperous. Those who journeyed through it, found the towns well paved, the roads well kept, and everywhere stone bridges solidly constructed. At measured distances, various inscriptions showed what share each commune had to take in the making of and cost of keeping up these roads. The fields were like gardens ; the hills, cut into terraces, were crowded with vineyards, chestnut, olive, and mulberry trees. The mountains were in most cases cultivated up to their very summits, and everywhere men were seen hard at work. On Sundays and on feast-days, these labourers showed themselves playing the lute, the shepherdesses sang lines from Ariosto, while the cut corn lay on the ground for many days, there being no apprehension of robbery. Everywhere activity reigned ; the mind was cultivated, and property was respected. Foreigners were much struck by this.

At Pistoja, the Rospigliosi, who in the following century were to see one of their descendants ascend the throne of St. Peter, held the first position among the noble families of the land. Taddeo Rospigliosi was known for his liberal hospitality. Montaigne, who was honoured by it, found ' the palace much adorned ; the service somewhat badly done, considering the splendour of the repast ; few servants ; wine served after meals, as in Germany.'

Lucca was still a free State, at least apparently so. Thanks to the Emperor's protection, she had hitherto escaped the fate of Sienna and Pisa. All her noblemen were engaged in commerce. The Buonvisi were the first family of the place. Nothing could be livelier than the aspect which the town wore, or pleasanter than the life led there. Many palaces, somewhat small but of good architectural merit, allowed both light and air to penetrate through high windows into spacious and vaulted rooms. In summer the meals were served in the doorway, and the passer-by joined in conversation with those who sat at dinner. There were few horses and no carriages. When any lady of rank went out, it was usually on a mule, and followed by a servant. The town resembled one large family, somewhat isolated from the rest of the world. The manners of the people, their turn of mind, and even their amusements reminded the visitor of the good old times, the great epoch of free cities in the Middle Ages. Few foreigners went there. When they did, it was mostly on their way to the baths of Lucca or of La Villa, which were both much in vogue at that time and much praised as regards comfort. Living was cheap : a pound of veal cost $1\frac{1}{2}d.$, and all other things were in proportion.

The bathing season lasted during the three summer months, but the Lucca nobility were wont to congregate there in May and in October, not for the sake of health, but in pursuit of pleasure, country dances, flirtations, and an intimacy untrammelled by etiquette. Sometimes a good troop of comedians, even that of the Disiosi, the most renowned in Italy, gave a series of representations, but dancing was the favourite amusement. The most influential people gave dances in turns. The people of the neighbouring villages were invited, by notice that on such a day such a person would give a dance. No one was backward in availing themselves of the invitation. The peasant girls who were known for their beauty arrived dressed as ladies. All wore white shoes, fine stockings, and a silk apron, and a rose over the right or left ear, as they belonged to the French or Spanish side. They curtsied in French fashion, by bending the knees—a usage followed in Tuscany and in the Duchy of Urbino—and danced with much grace and style the various national dances, and especially the ‘caprioles and moulinets’ (a skip and a twist). The fashionable people all mixed in the dance, if only not to appear ‘too reserved.’ The ball generally began on the piazza, and, when the heat became too great, it was continued in the Buonvisi Palace. A supper always terminated the feast. The prettiest peasant girls were chosen to sit at the principal table. A similar distinction was always conferred upon the celebrated Divizia, a peasant woman who was neither young nor pretty, and who neither knew how to read nor to write, but who knew how to improvise pretty lines upon mythological or other subjects, and could recite Ariosto from beginning to end, merely from having often heard it recited to her. Sometimes at the end of a ball prizes were given to the guests. It was a true and genuine gaiety, altogether without false pride on the one hand, or shyness on the other, wholly in conformity with the customs of a people the various classes of which did not look upon one another as enemies, but were, on the contrary, accustomed to live in harmony, and knew how to meet without mingling.

Besides travelling from north to south, or from south to north, that is, between Rome and Upper Italy, or the countries beyond the Alps, the road from Rome to Naples was not less frequented. It followed the old Via Appia, and passed through Marino and Velletri.

Well-mounted horsemen could ride to Naples in four days. But, as the country was overrun by bands of robbers, travellers preferred waiting for the slower but safer journey with the 'procaccio,' a kind of caravan which had been organised for the conveyance of goods, and which was escorted by papal and vice-regal guards. Upon this road, which was badly famed for its dirty and crowded inns, might be seen, whenever a procaccio went by, a crowd of monks, priests, bishops and their suites, tradespeople and men of business, Spaniards in great numbers, but few other foreigners, and scarcely any French, for they seldom visited a land the sovereign of which was so often at war with their own. 'Naples, however,' writes a Frenchman who was there at the end of the sixteenth century, 'is not a bad place for Frenchmen, provided they can bear patiently with a little chaff; but that accounts for there only being one Frenchman there now-a-days, and he is there only because of Orazio, who they say is the best horseman in Italy.' A Latin inscription, written on a monumental post erected on the confines of the Neapolitan territory, promised to those who arrived as friends a peaceful stay, the absence of immorality, and the protection which good laws afford:—'Hospes, hic sunt fines regni Neapolitani. Si amicus advenis, omnia pacata invenies et, malis moribus pulsus, bonas leges.' The first result of these good laws was the exaction of the guardians of the public safety, and of the customs officers, who were most severe against people leaving the country. The exportation of horses and of bullion was strictly prohibited. No man was allowed to take more than 25 scudi with him. From Fondi downwards the road was paved. Foreigners marvelled at the beauty of the various sites they came across. Terracina, Fondi, Mola di Gaeta struck them as very 'graceful' places, but they complained of the ignorance of the inhabitants, who were unable to satisfy their curiosity with respect to the numerous antiquities which they met on their way.

The Venetian senator Girolamo Lippomano, who was sent shortly after the battle of Lepanto as an ordinary ambassador to the Court of Don Juan of Austria, then residing at Naples, gives of that city the following description¹:—

✓ 'The antiquity of Naples, the beauty of her position, her numerous aristocracy (there are 13 dukes, 30 marquises, and 54 counts, who almost all inhabit their own palaces, and some of whom, though in debt, in consequence of the great expenses in which they indulge, have from 50,000 to 100,000 ducats a year), the abundance of everything, her large population, which is reckoned at 200,000 inhabitants, and her number of hospitals and richly endowed monasteries, make her a truly royal city, and give her rank as one of the principal towns of Europe. Among the pious institutions of the place there is a "Mont de Piété" (pawnbroker's) which lends money without interest to those in want. The Jews are no more allowed to reside in Naples than in any other of His Catholic Majesty's dominions. Thanks to its advantageous position on the sea, to its palaces, gardens, and public monuments, which cover the plains and the surrounding hills; thanks to its commercial relations abroad and to the extreme facility with which tradespeople can from day to day acquire houses and trade stocks in the country for many hundred thousand scudi's worth, Naples has become one of the richest towns of Italy and of Europe. Though she has long had this reputation, her population has nevertheless greatly increased during the last thirty years, and indeed to such a degree that the area of the town, which formerly covered four miles, now covers six. The two miles thus added are almost already built up, for the people like to live in Naples, owing to the franchise which the town enjoys, to the work, of which poor people are never in want, and because they are not, as in the provinces, tyrannised over by the Government agents. There are 100,000 fires in Naples, and by fire I mean a house, be it a palace or a cottage. Upwards of three thousand "tomuli" of grain are consumed every day, irrespectively of that which the convents and other congregations absorb. Many people think that this aggrandisement of Naples is not in the King's interest, because those who leave the provinces, where they would have continued to pay taxes, are exempted in Naples, and, what is worse, because in time of war the natives, numerous, excitable, and unruly as they are, besides disliking the Spaniards, might attempt a revolution. It is therefore believed that the Government would do well to strengthen and enlarge Fort St. Elmo, which commands the greater portion of the new quarters. The Neapolitans are very religious and zealous in the service of God, but will not hear of any tribunal of the Inquisition. The mere mention of the word would cause them to rise, as indeed they have already done. The inhabitants of this noble country are clever and prompt in their undertakings. They cultivate letters and the arts, they devote themselves to commerce and to agriculture, to all the occupations of peace and war, but are wanting in stability, and ever anxious to possess something new. This fault, which we read of as peculiar to the nation at all times, is the cause of those seditions, wars, ruins, and other calamities which are the consequence of the ambition and natural venom of such people. The prudence, however, of the Spaniards, or rather the want of native chiefs and protectors of the country, accounts for their being now in peace and incredibly submissive, thus greatly helping the Government properly to organize itself.'

Such a peaceful state was, however, never of very long duration. As a smouldering fire for ever works in the interior of Vesuvius, so discontent was ever breeding secretly, and periodically broke out in rebellions which were repressed at once with excessive severity. Numerous imprisonments and a few executions were the consequence of such revolts, and those who were compromised sought to escape into the Pontifical territory, where the hand of the Viceroy could not reach them. Some years after Lippomano's embassy, a repressed rebellion caused Rome to be filled with some 10,000 or 12,000 Neapolitan emigrants, among whom was Prince Ventograno, who had contrived to escape in the disguise of a gray friar.¹

The sosiego (an untranslatable Spanish word, inasmuch as no other language can exactly render that feeling peculiar to the Spanish nation, which results from pride and indifference, from an exaggerated idea of one's own dignity, and from a natural tendency to idleness), the luxury, and magnificence of the representatives of Charles V. and of Philip II. had become proverbial. 'I thought I was going to visit a viceroy,' writes one, 'and I found the King of Spain.' Complaints were also loud against the manner in which the public money was lavished, for which some viceroys, and, still more, their agents, were culpably responsible, as well as against the numerous abuses and inconveniences resulting especially from frequent changes. There were, however, among the viceroys several statesmen of merit, men of note, well-behaved towards their subjects, and better than the reputation they left behind them. Constantly exposed as they were to the intrigues of rivals in Madrid, to the suspicious humour of their sovereign, to the hatred of the nobility, and to the turbulent character of the Neapolitan people, the position of these high functionaries was not an enviable one, and cannot be compared with the most difficult and complex positions of a similar nature in our times.

Such was the aspect which Italy bore towards the end of the pontificate of Gregory XIII.

The travellers, whom we have accompanied from the Alps, have at last almost reached their journey's end. Fifteen miles ahead they see in the horizon two culminating points: Monte Mario and St. Peter without its cupola, but already throwing up that lofty gallery which was to bear it. The children of that rude generation, little accustomed to hide their feelings, give way to the emotions which the sight creates. They dismount, bow their heads to the ground, and wash it with their tears ; then, lifting their hands to heaven, bless God that He should have spared them to see the Holy City.

PART THE SECOND.

CHAPTER I.

THE CONCLAVE.

AT the time that our narrative begins, Gregory XIII. had entered his eighty-fourth year, and was approaching the end of the thirteenth year of his pontificate. Nothing, however, showed that his end was near. The Pope, whose constitution was equally robust and sanguine, enjoyed apparently perfect health. As before, he said mass three times a week, and often appeared in public, took exercise by walking up and down the long galleries of the Vatican, which he had mostly built himself, attended his chapels and his consistories, and, on certain fixed days, received the ambassadors of the great Powers. He had the talent, which, in the opinion of his contemporaries, was a guarantee of longevity, of putting easily aside all disagreeable or painful thoughts. His friends hoped therefore to see him, like his father and other members of his family, reach the last limits of the human age. Those, however, who frequented the Vatican, and the Venetian envoys who were for ever seeking for Court intelligence, believed that they had perceived some unsatisfactory symptoms.¹ Gregory XIII., who habitually treated himself with so much severity, and was so little given to the pleasures and amusements of the world, was beginning to modify his tastes. He called musicians to the palace, was present at the games and dances of a son of Signor Giacomo, and shut himself up for hours with a jeweller who enjoyed his friendship, and examined jewellery. These very innocent distractions were, however, so novel in him that they could not escape the notice of those who surrounded him. From that time, belief in a coming change became rife.

In the early days of November 1584,² it so happened that the Papal standard on Fort St. Angelo was struck down by lightning. The Romans saw in this a supernatural warning of the approaching death of their Pontiff. The Venetian envoy believed the incident to be of sufficient importance for him to report it to the Doge, adding however 'that such prophecies were not to be relied upon; that men's lives could not depend upon such accidents, but rather on the will of God; and that the strong and robust constitution of Gregory warranted the hope that he had still a few years to live.' On March 13,³ Cardinal de Sens wrote to the Duke of Nevers that the Pope enjoyed excellent health. The event, however, proved the superstitious to be in the right.

Notwithstanding the doctor's entreaties, Gregory had fasted severely during Lent. On April 5, a fever seized him, which did not, however, prevent his being present in the chapel on the following Sunday, or presiding at the consistory on the Monday, after receiving the Spanish ambassador. On the following day he took to his bed, never again to rise from it. His illness (bronchitis) made such rapid progress that he could neither confess nor receive communion, and on April 10, as his nephew, Cardinal San Sisto, administered the last sacraments to him, he gave up the ghost.¹

Gregory² was born at Bologna on January 7, 1502. His father was a tradesman of ordinary means, who belonged to that 'mezzo ceto' which in Italy, at that time, far surpassed the middle classes of other countries in their way of living, their education and comforts, but which an almost insurmountable barrier separated from the nobility of the land. Gregory's father had had the good fortune of marrying a Marescalchi, and of thus being admitted into the ranks of the Bologna aristocracy and seeing his son become a successor of St. Peter. He thus became the founder of the illustrious family of the Buoncompagni, which later was merged into another Papal family, the Ludovisi (Gregory XV.), both of which are now represented by the family of Prince Piombino. Hugh, his son, had studied law, and filled with honour, for three years, at the University of Bologna, the office of lecturer. Among his numerous audience were men destined to play a great part in the world and even to wear the tiara. Among these were Reginald Pole, Charles Borromeo, Alexander Farnese, Otto Truchsess. He was thirty-six years of age when he left the university and his country to go to Rome and become a priest. The rapid career which he made was due to his great reputation as a lawyer, to his proverbial honesty, and a little also perhaps to the good graces of Paul IV. and of the Caraffas. He was specially esteemed as a lawyer, and as such made himself useful and was equal to the increased duties imposed upon him. Having been remarked at the Council of Trent, as apostolic auditor entrusted with the drawing up of decrees, he was promoted by Pius IV. to be a cardinal, and was sent soon after to Spain, with the delicate mission of revising the case of the unfortunate Carranza, Archbishop of Toledo. From that time he was looked upon as 'papable'—eligible to the papacy. His election was a settled thing in the minds of the cardinals before even they met in conclave, and on the third day he was elected Pope by 'adoration,' that is without ballot, and by the fact of the spontaneous and unanimous consent of all the members of the Sacred College.

We have already examined the merits of Gregory XIII. As head of the Church, he was certainly a great man and an intelligent Pontiff, zealously pursuing the work of reform, though with more prudence than his over strict predecessor, entering into the just appreciation of the high mission which he had to fulfil, and fulfilling it in accordance with the spirit of the age and in conformity with the wants of the period. This estimate of the man is confirmed by the unanimous testimony of all his contemporaries, even of his detractors, and has been ratified by history. No one has ever tried to contest it. Parsimonious with respect to himself, he was singularly liberal, and even magnificent, in everything connected with the performance of public offices. He was prodigal perhaps of his finances when it was a question of endowing churches, or of founding a college, or of propagating the faith in distant countries, or of erecting monuments, rather rich than tasteful—a fault, by the way, not so much his own as that of the times in which he lived.

As temporal sovereign, Gregory by no means realized the hopes conceived of him on his accession. The position of Italy, as that of Europe, required a statesman of the highest order at Rome. Gregory was only a lawyer. He delighted in nothing so much as to preside at the ‘segnatura,’ or any other tribunal. He looked at everything from an exclusively legal point of view. His opinion once formed, he gave it without ever rescinding his judgment, unless by dint of logical reasonings he was made to see that he was in the wrong. No considerations of opportunity or political requirements could exercise any influence over his mind. He was a judge devoted to justice, but who sought justice only where right existed. When he thought he had cleared that point which to him was the only essential one to clear, his decrees were given, and he believed that he had fulfilled the duties of a sovereign. As for the carrying out of his decrees, he troubled himself little about it, so that his ordinances and decisions were always looked upon as dead letters. With regard to political matters, he understood them little, took no interest in them, had no sequence in his views, and, what is worse, showed at times some wish to initiate plans likely to animate foreign Courts with the hope that he would carry out that which he neither had the means nor the earnest will to realize.¹ He left the care of his state affairs to Cardinal Galli, better known as Cardinal of Como, who had already under Pius IV. been entrusted with the reins of government. Como was narrow-minded, but honest, a man who liked and attracted men of little worth, and who tried to keep himself in power by a simple process (much followed at Courts), which consists in following the tastes rather than adopting the ideas of one's master. He studiously avoided speaking to the Pope oftener than was necessary upon political matters, represented things to him in their most favourable light, spared him all mental labour, postponed matters difficult to resolve or prolonged indefinitely questions of an intricate nature (which, by the way, is often a detestable solution of such questions). The Pope, who was a determined partisan of peace, nevertheless irritated sovereigns by his want of proper attention to them or their cause, when once he believed himself to be in the right. The lawyer always had the whip-hand of the politician. The Cardinal acted in the same manner, and his master enjoyed the accounts which he gave of his interviews with the various ambassadors. No one knew better than Como how to put in a disagreeable word without in the least departing from his exquisite politeness of manner.

Members of the diplomatic body, however, gave him credit for being accommodating so soon as a decision had been come to by the Pope, and, generally speaking, to be a man of his word. Como had formerly been the retainer of a Roman prelate. When Monsignor Garimberto rode out on horseback, young Galli followed him on foot. Now matters had changed, and the same prelate could be seen in the ante-room of the splendid Bramante¹ Palace on the Piazza Scossa Cavalli which was then the property of the powerful cardinal, happy and honoured by the recognition of his former servant. The Romans found it natural enough. Each would have done as much, for everyone was accustomed to these sudden changes and vicissitudes of fortune. The Venetian ambassador, however, mentions the fact as a proof of what fortune can do for a man at the Pontifical Court.

The Pope's nephews, Cardinal San Sisto, son of Gregory's brother² an excellent man, whose tendencies were French, and Cardinal Guastavillani, a son of his sister, and rather a man of the world than a statesman,¹ whose agreeable ways were much liked, had each good fortunes but no share of power.

It was said of Gregory, that, little liked by his subjects, and caring less for popularity, except at times, he was sincerely attached to none but to Giacomo, Duke of Sora, his natural son, the offspring of an attachment with a Bologna lady while he was still a professor of law, and long before he had entered holy orders.² This son constituted the happiness and torment of the Pope. Gregory had centred all his affections in him; but scruples of conscience, the duties of his office, the pious exhortations of Padre Toledo and of Charles Borromeo, made him decide on removing him from his person. The ties of blood always ended by bringing him back. Gregory's home existence was spent in these constant secret struggles, which were apparent by the occasional disgrace and returns to favour of which the young Giacomo was alternately the object, by his sudden banishments from the capital and subsequent recalls. Sora was a young man of elegant ways, of a gentle and agreeable character, very thoughtless, but generally liked. Ever in debt, he led a splendid existence at the Palazzo Colonna, which he occupied with his wife, Donna Costanza Sforza, a sister of the Count di Santa Fiora.³ A bitter enemy of the Farnese, he was an instrument in the hands of the adversaries of that family. Cardinal de' Medici had also an eye upon him, for the use which he could make of him in the coming Conclave. Gregory's changeable humour towards him affected him deeply. He confided his grief to everyone, complained bitterly of the fate that made him son of a Pope; but no sooner did the rays of fortune shine upon him, than his careless nature got the better of him. At the commencement and also in the latter years of the pontificate he held the important and lucrative post of Governor of Holy Church—that is, of commander-in-chief of the Pontifical forces, and military governor of Rome. With Cardinal Como, then, as State Minister, and his son Giacomo as guardian of his personal security, as well as of that of his subjects, Pope Gregory XIII. governed his States. High legal attainments, honesty, goodness, almost good-nature, characterised the Pope, mediocrity his cabinet minister, and carelessness his military superintendent. Though the treasury and the country were gradually getting poorer, life was easy in Rome, where money poured in with the strangers that came, and where the action of the Government was scarcely felt—'where both good and bad were equally at their ease;' but brigandage and penury were rife in the provinces, and impotence and impunity reigned everywhere.

Gregory was a fine man; he was tall and majestic, his forehead low, but broad and little wrinkled. His look, which was kind,¹ showed the honesty which was his principal characteristic. Nevertheless he was not prepossessing at first. He affected, as is so often the case, that which he had least, viz. severity, and took pleasure in making life disagreeable to those who had to treat with him, as, for instance, to ambassadors. Through this borrowed mask, however, men soon saw how good he was at heart. His kindness was too general to allow of his attaching himself strongly to any individual, and was therefore powerless in attaching others to him. Such a failing in a sovereign is undoubtedly a great one, since it deprives him of solid and devoted attachments, while it creates around him a vacuum which will only appear to him in the day of evil, and when it is too late to fill the gap.

Gregory XIII. loved the country, and spent regularly part of the summer at a villa which Vignola had built for Cardinal Altemps, above Frascati, on the slope of the Latin Hills, in a magnificent country the picturesque charms of which have often been described. Mondragone—the magnificent result not of genius but of perfect intuition of proportions, and enjoying the pure air and broad view which with Rome includes a great portion of the Papal dominions—was dear to Gregory. He spent there his happiest moments. Beneath the hospitable roof of the illustrious Altemps, he could, better than at the Vatican or at the Quirinal, throw off all preoccupations and avoid the ennuis of official life, but especially that of receiving ambassadors, who, however, using their privilege, sometimes came to disturb him in his retreat. At Mondragone took place, in the spring of the year 1573, the tragi-comical scene of the expulsion of the ambassador Paolo Tiepolo, who had brought the Pope the news of the signing of peace between Venice and the Turks. Hearing of this defection, which he had so little expected after the victory of Lepanto, Gregory got up from his chair in a passion, flew upon the unfortunate ambassador, who at once took to his heels, and pursued him through the house. The ambassador, finding himself abandoned by his followers, was obliged to return alone to Rome, without even an escort, and in danger of being robbed by the mercenaries who, on their way to Naples, were then infesting the Campagna. This strange proceeding made a great noise at the time, but did not bring on a rupture of diplomatic relations between Venice and Rome.

Cardinal Altemps had built Mondragone to be agreeable to the Pope, but the latter, while accepting his offers of hospitality, never spared his host. He had ordered that the titles of the holders of Church fiefs should be revised, and, to everyone's astonishment, Altemps was not exempted. In Gregory's time the laws were made for everyone, but were obeyed by nobody, as occurred in the present case. The work of the revision, which had resulted from a conception of right, and was a measure corresponding to a want felt by the Administration, caused great alarm among the nobility, but nothing came of it. The Romans were wont to say, 'Habemus Papam negativum.'

Such was the Pontiff who had just died. Notwithstanding the alarming rumours which foreboded his death, and which had filled Rome during the winter, no one was prepared for it, not even the members of his own family, nor those most intimate at Court, and best informed on all that took place.¹ People found that the Pope lasted too long. 'The Roman courtiers,' says a Venetian envoy, 'like the wheel to turn often, because each man hopes to win in the lottery. They give each Pope five years to live, and are displeased when the lease is renewed.' This time, however, even the impatient were surprised. The fears and consternation of the public on hearing of the Pope's death were but too well justified.

Happily, the almost official disturbers of peace, the banditti and their chiefs, were as much surprised as the Government and the Sacred College. No one was disposed to disturb order, or to maintain it. Cardinal Guastavillani, as camerlingo, assumed as a right the direction of the State during the interregnum. With him the cardinals hastened to organise a defence against the attacks of the banditti, and of some suspected Roman noblemen, and to take promptly the most indispensable measures. The Cardinals of Medici, Colonna, and Guastavillani, were specially entrusted with the care of watching over the public safety. They resolved that not a single bandit should be tolerated in Rome, that letters should be sent to the feudatory barons, exhorting them to keep peace in the provinces, and to expel the outlaws to whom they gave protection. The Grand-Duke of Tuscany and the Viceroy of Naples were advised of these steps, and requested to take measures against the evil.

By motives of prudence as well as of propriety, but especially because each pretender to the Papacy did not care to alienate from him the good-will of the preceding Pope's creatures¹—the Sacred College confirmed, on the motion of Cardinal de' Medici, the appointments held by Giacomo, as General of Holy Church, and Mario Sforza as his lieutenant, and appointed a protégé of San Sisto to the vacant post of the Borgo. The Savelli, according to custom, were to guard the Conclave. The Sforzas collected men who were specially told off to police duties. Some agitation, but no disturbances, reigned in Rome. At one time a conflict was feared between Sora and Prosper Colonna, brother of the cardinal, who arrived before Rome with his 'slayers,' as the regular troops under his command were called by the people. A formal injunction to remain away stopped his progress. There were a few isolated cases of assassination, and several false alarms; but with these exceptions—thanks to the active and energetic intelligence of Cardinal de' Medici, who, a mediocrity as a churchman, was born to command—peace was maintained during the interregnum, against all expectation.

The usual ceremonies took place, therefore, without being disturbed by any untoward incident. The body of Gregory, which had first been carried to St. Peter and placed in the chapel of Sixtus IV., was afterwards exposed for three days in the Gregorian chapel. The obsequies took place in the Sistine Chapel on the three following days, and ended by high mass at St. Peter's, where a catafalque was raised in the centre of the church. Immediately after these funeral ceremonies, which were minutely prescribed by the ritual and tradition, the cardinals entrusted with the government business met in the sacristy, where they received in succession, for the purpose of praising the defunct Pope, Count Olivarès, the Spanish ambassador, Baron Frederic Madruccio, brother of Cardinal Madruccio, the Emperor's ambassador, and Cardinal d'Este, Protector of France, as representative of the French ambassador. Marquis de Pisany, the ambassador of the very Christian King, only arrived on April 18, as the cardinals were about to meet in conclave. It was not without some difficulty that, notwithstanding an attempt of his Spanish colleague to postpone his audience until after the Conclave,¹ he succeeded in being received by the cardinals, 'who,' said he with humour, 'were only thinking what Pope they could elect who would be the best Spaniard at heart.' At the outset the rivalry between the Courts of Paris and Madrid appears in the relations between the two representatives.² This antagonism was brought about by force of circumstances, but was likely to create in the future a number of inconveniences, of embarrassments, and of dangers to the Pope who might be elected by the Conclave, at the doors of which the ambassadors of France and Spain were fighting, the one with all the energy and 'furiam' common to his country, and the other with all the Castilian reserve and 'sosiego.'

The news of the death of Gregory was received with regret in Madrid, with indifference at Prague, and with ill-dissembled satisfaction in Paris and in Venice.¹

¹ Arch. Ven. Deliberazioni, April 1585. The senate expresses in very mild terms the regret which it experiences on hearing of the death of a Pope, who was 'a zealous pastor of God's glory.' Not a word on its political relations with him. The praise was fair, but the laconic style was significant.

CHAPTER II.

PRELIMINARIES.

IF the sudden death of Gregory caused universal astonishment, the event was foreseen by those who had most interest in not being taken by surprise. Such were the members of the Sacred College, the great Catholic States, and the Italian princes.

The cardinals, some of whom were looked upon as eligible for the Papacy, and of whom several, being the creatures of Gregory XIII., had gathered, as was the custom, around his nephew, but who all, owing to the fervent spirit which characterised the epoch, sincerely wished to make a good choice, appeared desirous to give their votes to the worthiest among them, to him who could best defend the faith against the encroachments of heresy, and continue in the Church the work of reform. In this respect matters had greatly changed since the beginning of the century.

If religion, however, had acquired a much larger share than formerly in the electoral canvassing of the members of the Conclave, political considerations and personal merits were not on that account excluded. Candidates for the Papacy had to look to the parties of various cardinals, and especially to those of the nephew of the last Pope, which were always more or less influential according to the duration of that Pope's pontificate. They had to consider the popularity which some competitors enjoyed, and still more the fears with which others inspired them. The memory of the unheard-of severity exercised by Pius IV.¹ at his accession, against a Caraffa, a nephew of his predecessor, was still present to all, though a quarter of a century had elapsed, and soared like a shadow over the electoral urn, making all concerned look from motives of fear, much less to a good Pope—that is, one favourable to the interests of each—than to the exclusion of those colleagues whom they considered hostile to them.

Princes likewise took their precautions, settled in their own minds which candidate they would wish to see successful, and instructed accordingly their ambassadors and cardinal-protectors. Candidates had therefore carefully to examine what were the secret wishes of the sovereigns of Germany, of Spain, and of France, armed as these already were, in fact, though not yet as a right, with the terrible privilege of exclusion. Could they only have contented themselves with the exercise of such a privilege! But donations, benefices, every species of favour, and even intimidation, were means not unfrequently used to procure friends at Rome. Notwithstanding all this, even here the effects of reform were visible. Charles V. had vied with Francis I. for influence by profuse liberalities, but soon discovered how useless were his efforts. Though the cardinals were children of those unscrupulous times, and accepted the favours bestowed upon them, were accommodating in business, and endeavoured by their good offices to promote the requests and claims of foreign princes, they knew on great occasions, and in a conclave especially, how to preserve their independence. Sovereigns were thus deceived in their expectations. It was especially after the election of Pope Caraffa that Charles V., who had requested his exclusion, became somewhat cold¹ in his relations with the Sacred College. His son followed his example. For ten years he suppressed the pensions which had been granted to cardinals. The kings of France did the same, so that the fountain of princely pensions had become singularly dry. Later, it is true, Philip reverted to the old ways; but the fact that the great majority of foreign cardinals were his own subjects, and dependent upon him, sufficiently explains his power, which was immense² in the Sacred College.

² Paolo Tiepolo, who as a Venetian is not impartial in regard to Philip II., complains of the means employed by that sovereign to influence the Sacred

If Olivarés abused that influence on many occasions, the King, instead of sanctioning the zeal of his ambassador, hesitated to press too heavily upon his purpled vassals ; not, however, because he had become indifferent to what took place at the Vatican, for until the last hour of his life he took the liveliest interest in all matters concerning the Holy See, of which he believed himself to be the supreme and most powerful protector on earth. In his opinion the Church and the crown of Spain had become one.¹ To influence the election of the Popes seemed to Philip a natural consequence of his holy mission, and a duty rather than a right. But how and within what limits was he to accomplish this end ? Such was the question which he often put to himself. Doubts and scruples, even remorse, sometimes troubled his soul, and made him on several occasions seek for enlightenment in the advice of theologians whom he had assembled together for the purpose.

Henry III. also could influence the coming Conclave, but the French party was not numerous, and it was politically divided. Some of its members, under Cardinal d'Este, were royalists ; others, under the fiery Cardinal of Sens, were followers of the League. It was doubtful whether they would arrive in time, notwithstanding the College, rel. 1576. Olivarès, on the contrary, in a memorable despatch to Philip II., exclaims against the ingratitude of Spanish and other cardinals, who are in receipt of the King's favours and pensions. He suggests some means of punishment, and of bringing them back to a due deference to the wishes of the Spanish crown.—Arch. Simancas, April 19, 1590, leg. 956.

¹ An Austrian writer, M. Guidely, has published on this matter some information picked up in the archives of Simancas. See Rudolf und seine Zeit (Prague, 1863) ; also his report to the Imperial Academy at Vienna, 1861.

pressing recommendations of Cardinal d'Este to Henry III. 'to make them get upon a horse, and arrive in as much haste as possible, as the Spaniards were making great efforts to elect the Pope before the arrival of the French cardinals.'¹

The Emperor Rodolph, as we have pointed out, paid little attention to Roman affairs. With regard to all matters connected with the Peninsula, he had abandoned, not without a certain amount of secret jealousy, to the Spanish branch of his house the direction of affairs, and with it the influence and profit to be derived from his intervention.

Next to the high diplomatic element came one, which, though less powerful, was not less active, and could in the stead of more material means supply a thorough knowledge of men and things at Rome, with the additional advantage of the proximity of their courts to that of Rome. This element was that of the official and unofficial agents of the several Italian princes, excepting, as regards the election of a sovereign pontiff, those of the most powerful State of the peninsula, the Republic of Venice,² which did not pretend to interfere in electoral proceedings. During an interregnum its ambassadors, who were always very well informed, continued to observe and report upon what they heard, but were on their guard; and its cardinals, though not ceasing to be animated in the Conclave with those patriotic feelings which characterised every Venetian, behaved as princes of the Church and not as political agents of their country. The exquisite instinct, the perfect acquaintance with affairs, the practical good sense of the Venetians, added to the material impossibility of getting up a sufficiently numerous Venetian faction—in short, the proverbial wisdom which presided over the acts of the Republic, explained her abstention.

² This important and curious fact, inasmuch as it behoves us to examine the Venetian politics of that day, is confirmed by the diplomatic correspondence of the Republican envoys.

Of the other Italian princes, each endeavoured to protect his small local interests in the Conclave, and these were of vital importance to them. Even the Duke of Urbino kept up intimate relations with one or two cardinals, gave pensions to some Roman prelates, to servants of the Vatican, to obliging subalterns, whose influence, though invisible, was not the less real everywhere, and nowhere so much as in Rome.

Next to Venice, the Prince of Savoy was the one in Italy to occupy himself least with the pontifical elections. Young Charles Emmanuel was about to marry the Infanta, daughter of Philip II., thus to become the vassal of Spain for some time, and to find in Madrid the support which he wanted in Rome. His affairs were, however, well protected by Cardinal Alessandrino, a nephew of Pius V., who, notwithstanding his mediocrity, was justly looked upon as one of the most influential members of the Sacred College.

This was not the case with the Grand-Duke of Tuscany, for whom the Vatican constituted the centre of the world. Befriended by the Pope, he felt himself protected against the rancour of Spain, whose designs upon Sienna, which he had once possessed, he always dreaded. In Henry III. he found a help against not only the Duke of Savoy, but especially against that terrible rival, the Duke of Parma, whom he suspected of aspiring to a future kingdom of Lombardy.¹ The Emperor's protection was likewise of some importance to him ; but without the efficacious friendship of the Pope, whose territory touched his own from Orbitello to Ferrara, or with a Pope hostile to him, he could exercise no influence whatever. The Dukes of Savoy and Parma, aided by Spain, and the Duke of Ferrara, intimately allied with France, would become the most important sovereigns in the north and in the west of Italy, according to the preponderance of one or other of these great Powers, and he, the Grand-Duke, would find even his territory threatened with invasion.

These considerations influenced the policy of the Court of Florence, justified the particular attention bestowed by it upon the affairs of Rome, and explained, without justifying them, the intrigues which it incessantly carried on there, and at no time so much as during the sittings of a Conclave. The result was that no one was so well informed as Francis of Tuscany of all the intimate details of the Vatican, into which his agents penetrated by a thousand ways, the echoes of which reached him by the daily correspondence of his cardinal brother, or of the Abbé Babbi, his brother's private secretary, or of Monsignor Alberti, his envoy, or of Monsignor Gerini, and, during the pontificate of Sixtus V., of Monsignor Sangaletto, secret chamberlain to that Pope. Into the higher spheres of Roman politics, however, the Venetian ambassadors had a better insight than he. His most useful associate in obtaining information, as well as in things to be done, was his brother Cardinal Ferdinand de' Medici.¹ Thirty-two years of age, and full of zeal for the welfare of his house, the cardinal was politically devoted to the Grand-Duke (for whom, however, he cared little), was exceedingly gifted, uncommonly active and ingenious, but unscrupulous, preferring the interests of his family to his own, and his own to those of the Church. He was looked upon as a prince, as a liberal in the sense then attributed to that word, as magnificent in his ways, and a protector of the arts, like all the Medici. Amiable with his subordinates out of policy, he liked to form a contrast with Francis, who, during the latter years of his reign, made himself daily more detested by his subjects. A first-class politician of a second-rate Power, while he kept his country within its narrow limits, notwithstanding his numerous relations, and the correspondence he exchanged with the most influential people of his day, he could dispose of a thousand means, because he could employ them without hesitation or scruple, provided they were useful to his purpose. Forgetful of his ecclesiastical position, but never of his princely dignity, he was more at home later as Governor of Tuscany, than at Rome in the Sacred College. At the Papal Court he enjoyed a great reputation, lived in great style at the Palazzo Fiorentino,² and sometimes at the Villa Medici on the Monte Pincio. Rather respected than liked by his colleagues, he had but one rival, Cardinal Farnese, whom he hated and feared equally, and for whom, while he outwardly preserved the forms of politeness, he never wholly disguised publicly his real aversion. As a proof of what he could do, it was said at Prague that even Cardinal Andrew of Austria owed to him the good reception he met with in Rome. Ferdinand's features were regular, but his forehead was rather high. His cold look contrasted with his apparent good temper, and revealed his character, which was naturally harsh and proud. He was tall, and exceedingly stout. His doubtful health inspired a good deal of anxiety, but never interfered with his devouring activity.

By those interested in his decease, we have said that the death of Gregory XIII. had long been foreseen, even from the day of his accession; for, as Cardinal d'Este wrote, 'no sooner is one Pope elected than his successor is thought of.'¹ But however much they may have foreseen it, the task of the various factions was not the less difficult. How could they anticipate all the accidents and incidents which start up and play such a part in the events of this world? How could they be sure beforehand, on so slippery a soil, of the last results of an operation in which friendship and spite, the fears of each, the remembrances of all, the hopes of some, the wish of one to keep a word given, the faltering of another, and petty treasons, never fail to take up so much room ; where Fate, or rather Providence, getting the best of our weaknesses, of those miserable trifles inherent to our natures, can baffle the cleverest reckonings, and at any moment reduce to nothing the largest conceptions, while justifying those who ingenuously believe and proclaim¹ that God alone can, in the uncertainties of a Conclave, as in the struggles of a battle-field, decide who shall or shall not be the winner ?

The former division of the Conclave into Imperial, French, and Spanish factions was almost extinct. During the long pontificate of Gregory XIII., certain coteries had been formed, at the head of which were the nephews of the last Popes : Farnese at the head of the creatures of Paul III., Borromeo and Altemps of those of Pius IV., and Alessandrino of the cardinals created by his uncle, Pius V.

Such a classification was rather the result of gratitude professed apparently or in reality by certain cardinals for the Pope who had promoted them, than of any common interests. Another still deeper line of demarcation divided the Sacred College into two camps. Farnese and Medici were the heads of it. Almost all the cardinals and even the holy and wise Charles Borromeo, who died shortly before Gregory, sided with one or the other. The foreign representatives joined issue, and during the whole of that reign the two factions disputed, not the actual power which was in the hands of the Pope and of the Cardinal of Como, but the future power, which, considering the great age of the Holy Father, was likely soon to be the present, and which each faction was as sure of grasping as its adversary was sanguine of success, both being equally active, strong, and prepared for a deadly fight.

The death of Gregory caused a great change in the constitution of both parties. Cardinal San Sisto, a nephew of Gregory, became the head of his uncle's creatures, and disposed naturally of a good many votes which, added to the scales of either one or the other of the two parties, must determine the victory. Unable to hope himself to become Pope (for the nephews and prime ministers of a defunct Pope were then ipso facto excluded),¹ San Sisto was master of the position. The issue of the Conclave depended upon him. He could elect the Pope if his followers adhered to him, that is if their gratitude was real, and not overpowered by foreign influences, by seductions, by intimidations, or the thousand and one artifices to which recourse is had to shake a devotion based rather, as we have said, on motives of propriety than upon a real fidelity to the memory of the dead—a slight defence, it must be confessed, in moments of a supreme crisis.

To gain San Sisto and all his followers, or to isolate him from them if he himself could not be gained over, was the chief object to be attained. The next thing to do was to insure the veto which the foreign princes could pronounce against the most formidable adversaries, to proceed first negatively, that is by 'exclusion,' then by 'inclusion,' that is by making a list of those to be favoured in various degrees, then to concentrate the votes of the majority upon the man most wished for, or, according to circumstances, least feared.

To this task Medici gave himself up with extreme ardour.¹ His inveterate hatred against Farnese, and, still more, political considerations, such as the prospect of a territorial aggrandisement of the duchy of Parma, or the re-establishment of the kingdom of Lombardy under the sceptre of the Farnese, explain the feverish activity of which he gave proof during those critical days in order to insure the exclusion of Paul III.'s nephew.

The death of Charles Borromeo² who was much devoted to the Medici, had left a vacant place in that faction which was insufficiently filled by Cardinal Altemps, a man of a sombre and vain character, and who at that time was much pressed by his friends to join the Farnese faction. These manœuvres alarmed the cardinal, who had also to fear a reconciliation between his great adversary and the King of Spain. The latter, forgetting old grievances, was about to restore the fortress of Piacenza to the Duke of Parma. Would he not likewise forget the hatred of Farnese and the exclusion with which he had visited him in the last

Conclave? An alliance between Parma and Savoy was already preparing under the auspices of the Court of Spain. That formidable prospect, which was to be realised as soon as Cardinal Farnese, with the aid of Philip, had become Pope, appeared before the mind of Ferdinand, alarmed him, fired him with anger, and became the rule of his future conduct.¹ On the very day after the Pope's death, he made overtures to San Sisto, who showed himself reserved, full of honeyed words, but not apparently inclined to favour either one or other of the contending parties. Medici set Simoncello to watch him, and instructed the former to put forward the candidature of Cesi, and to propose secretly to San Sisto a marriage between the duke his brother and a Cesi. The other Gregorians whom Medici had sounded all appeared to be determined to vote as their chief San Sisto would. But Gregory's other nephew, Cardinal Guastavillani, showed favourable dispositions, and if he could be gained over, his acquisition would prove useful. Towards the evening, the position of affairs had already changed. Alessandrino and Altemps gave promises to vote with Medici against Farnese. Spinola, who was entirely devoted to the Emperor, inclined the same way. Some of the Gregorians, who in the morning were so united with San Sisto, showed already some hesitation. In all these preliminaries no question other than the exclusion of the senior member of the Sacred College was mooted; and on this ground the coalition between Medici and Alessandrino was an accomplished fact, since both shared the same aversion to Farnese, but they did not as yet agree on the subject of the 'inclusion,' that is, as to the names of the candidates whom they should bring forward.

Medici, who was rejoicing in this early success, went no further for the present. He spoke of Cesi occasionally, without insisting on his name, and even without appearing to attach any great importance to his being chosen, so afraid was he lest he should offend the susceptibilities of his new allies. These were a precious acquisition to him in the pursuit of the object he had in view, and which he flattered himself he had almost gained, when an accident upset every combination, and turned the scales in favour of his rival.

Philip II. resolved on not excluding Farnese. Whether scrupulous motives induced him to remain neutral in the matter, or whether regard for the ever-victorious Prince Alexander of Parma, the commander of his army in Flanders, or perhaps both incentives, certain it is that he forgot his old dislike for the senior cardinal, and let it be known by his ambassador everywhere that he had resolved to leave to the Holy Ghost the task of enlightening the electors, and intended therefore to allow the Conclave to enjoy the fullest freedom of action. This news came down as a thunderbolt upon Medici. Spread by Spanish partisans, the news unsettled all the cardinals that had been gained over to Medici's cause on the ground that they had been made to believe that Philip would declare against Farnese.¹ In order that any further doubt on the subject might be at once dispelled, Olivarés went himself to Medici, and informed him of the neutral position taken up by his master.

To this political disappointment was added a personal mortification. As 'Protector' of Spain he could depend on being intrusted with the King's instructions to the council, as was usual. These were called 'the Prince's secrets;' and were most important, especially in the hands of Medici, who had fully made up his mind to profit by them as much in his own as in the King's interest. Olivarés informed him that on this occasion Philip had intrusted this mission to Cardinal Madruccio, who, though absent, was hourly expected from Trent, of which see he was bishop. Medici endeavoured in vain to hide his mortification, and told the ambassador that, if His Majesty had made his intentions known sooner, he and his brother would have followed a different course; that they were themselves able, through the means at their disposal, to have Farnese elected Pope, and that they would not have gone so far in another direction had they been able to foresee the neutrality of Spain; in fact, that this neutrality was in reality an indirect support given by Spain to the senior cardinal. Such was also the general impression.

For a long time past, Cardinal Medici had conceived the idea of reviving the ill feeling of Philip against his antagonist, and had, with this object, intrigued first at Prague, where the Medici were in great favour, and next through the Emperor's ambassador in Madrid where they had little influence, in order to bring it about that Olivarès should receive a formal order to exclude Farnese. After some hesitation, which lost precious time, the Grand-Duke Francis came over to his brother's views. Pressing instructions were sent in consequence to the Tuscan agent at Prague. The messenger who carried these instructions, together with the news of the death of Gregory, reached Prague twenty-four hours before Madruccio's messenger, and the intelligent and active Urbani at once set to work. Notwithstanding the ceremonies of Holy Week, and the difficulty of getting Rodolph to receive an ambassador, Urbani contrived to obtain an audience. The Emperor listened to him with attention and even with kindness, and also with that reflective calmness under the mask of which he knew so well how to hide his want of resolution. He gave no promise either one way or the other. Knowing, however, that the Emperor never took a step without consulting his ministers, Urbani went to the Vice-Chancellor, who was then ill and in bed, endeavoured to gain him over to the cause, exhausted his eloquence, but extracted no positive promise. That high functionary, however, appeared to agree with him, and even got angry with his master for being so irresolute, but all these fine words ended in nothing. Urbani was not more successful with Trautson and Dr. Curtius, the two leading members of the cabinet. King Philip's views were not known, and there was no desire to annoy him in ignorance as might thus be done, or to give them cause for displeasure at Madrid, simply to gratify Florence, and to make an enemy of the Prince of Parma. The Spanish ambassador was in the same position. Formerly in the army, and hoping some day to be made a commander in Flanders under Alexander Farnese, he declined having anything to do with such an intrigue. In fact it had been badly managed from the outset, and could not bring about any result, even if events had not marched on more rapidly than the deliberations of the Imperial Court. To please Urbani, however, were it only for appearance' sake, it was decided that the brothers Madruccio should be furnished with instructions for the Conclave. These were still being prepared when the news arrived that the Pope had been elected, and was already installed in the Vatican.

The diplomatic campaign could not bring about any result, and in Rome Medici's plans, which had been long prepared in silence, had likewise failed. What made matters worse was that Cardinal Sisto, after silently listening to the proposals of marriage for his brother, had indignantly rejected such an offer, had mentioned it to his friends, and rallied to his views, together with them, the cardinal himself who had been instructed to make the proposal, which was to gain him over to the Medici cause. Other attempts at corruption of which Medici had been guilty got wind among his colleagues. It was known that he had given money to Sforza ; that he furnished at his own expense the rooms of the Cardinal of Florence ; in fact, that he stopped at nothing to insure the exclusion of his formidable rival. It was to this end that he exhorted his brother to return to Florence from the country, there to watch the coming through of the cardinals of Austria and Madruccio, but especially the French cardinals who were then on their way to Rome, and were obliged to travel through Tuscany,—to conciliate them by means of offers, promises, presents if necessary—in short, at any cost and by every possible means. Time was pressing, however, and he had lost ground. The neutrality of the Spanish Crown and San Sisto's hostility appeared to offer insurmountable obstacles to his designs. He was either to look upon himself as beaten, or to change his tactics. He took the latter course. It was no longer a question of rallying San Sisto and the Gregorians, but of separating the latter from their chief, who had just declared for Farnese, and eventually for Savello, should Farnese be impossible. These two cardinals, and especially Farnese, were open enemies of the Duke of Sora (Giacomo Buoncompagni), who naturally was anxious as to his fate, on remembering that of Caraffa, and particularly interested therefore in the coming elections. This similarity of fears brought him naturally into closer contact with Medici, whose most devoted agent he became during the few days that preceded the Conclave. Active, impetuous, obedient, he worked upon his cousin Guastavillani, and subsequently shook the faith of several Gregorians whom he afterwards gained over, but who soon left him again, following in this the example of Guastavillani, who, naturally irresolute and impressionable, wavered between the two factions without pronouncing for either. Such was the state of things eight days after the death of Gregory XIII. With the exception of Cesi's name, which had been incidentally thrown out, exclusions alone had been spoken of. A candidate had, however, to be chosen, and Medici, at once favouring his own interests and his spite, decided on proposing in earnest Cardinal Cesi, as devoted to the Grand-Duke's family, and because he was hostile to Philip II.¹ He intended, if he could not secure Cesi's election, to vote for Albani or for Montalto. This latter cardinal was very much more eligible in the eyes of the public (who appreciated him justly, though they liked him not) than in the opinion of the members of the Sacred College. With the exception of Alessandrino and Rusticucci, both creatures of Pius V. and friends of Montalto, no cardinal seemed disposed to elect a monk as their Pope. Even Medici held him in reserve only as a last resource, and because he depended upon the gratitude of the 'poor cardinal,' who was the obliged of the Grand-Duke, from whom now and then he received some small offerings.

Cesi was therefore, for the present, the only man thought of. He had formerly held important posts, and now lived a retired existence in his dull palace of the Borgo. He was remarkable for solid rather than brilliant qualities, and enjoyed universal esteem. In the opposite camp, Savello and Farnese had most followers. The latter was evidently favoured, if not by the King of Spain, at least by his ambassador, who was at all events quite able to act of his own accord. He, however, sought every occasion of meeting Medici, and even one morning came to breakfast with him at the Vatican, and by his reserved politeness, his half words, the sense of which was scarcely comprehensible, increased the doubts and perplexities of the cardinal. At last the Grand-Duke made known his intentions to his brother. Preferring the safer mode of verbal explanations to written instructions, he sent to him his secretary, the State Councillor Vinta, who was enjoined to recommend prudence and to disavow, from motives of caution and fear of being compromised, rather than from any scruples of conscience, the attempts at corruption so warmly recommended to him by Ferdinand.¹

One of the most eminent members of the Sacred College, celebrated equally for his noble birth, his fine character, his cultivated mind, the largeness of his views, and all those other advantages which the management of great affairs alone can give to those only who are born to manage such affairs, Cardinal d'Este,² while much disposed to follow in the wake of Cardinals de' Medici and Alessandrino, had up to that time kept an almost absolute silence and impenetrable reserve in the midst of all the intrigues that were being carried on.

Louis d'Este, brother of Alphonso II., Duke of

² The voluminous correspondence between Cardinal d'Este and Henry III. and Villeroy is in Paris at the Imperial Library.

Ferrara, was allied through his mother, Madame Renée, to the royal house of Valois. An admirer of France, where he had twice resided as a legate, and devoted to Henry III., he never refused him his advice, nor even his intervention, which ever was an active, and sometimes an ardent and useful one.¹ To him Cardinal d'Este was a precious auxiliary, especially in those fatal times when the prestige of the very Christian King, which was much shaken in France, was completely gone at the Court of the Vatican, which under the last Pope had been entirely devoted to the King of Spain, and had strongly sympathised with the League.

M. de Pisany, who was Henry III.'s ambassador, was justified in writing to his master that, 'were it not for Cardinal d'Este, the affairs of your Majesty would be of no consequence here.' D'Este lived in Rome at the Monte Giordano,² one of the Orsini forts, and in the summer at his beautiful villa near Tivoli, which had been constructed by Ligorio Pirro for Cardinal Hippolytus d'Este. It is one of the numerous monuments which still prove what art could do for the princes of the Church.³ The large revenues of Cardinal d'Este, which were only less great than those of Farnese, were entirely spent in works of charity or in encouraging the arts, and in the noblest hospitality. His palace was always full of guests. On one occasion, when the Duke of Nevers visited him, he found, already established there, two cardinals and a score of French bishops and their suites, besides the Pepoli family. At the time that the Conclave met, D'Este was only forty-seven years of age ; but his weak health made people fear, what he himself felt, that his end might be near. De Thou called him the poor man's treasure and the ornament of the Sacred College.

That influential cardinal at last showed what the intentions of Henry III. were, and that they were in favour of Savello and for the exclusion of Cesi. He gave out, however, that these views were not insurmountable, provided he had time enough to write to Paris and receive an answer. In point of fact, the French Government dreaded only Cardinal Madruccio, who was intrusted with the wishes of both branches of the house of Austria, Philip's vassals, and, in short, Spain.¹ M. de Pisany, who had arrived that very day (April 18), made no secret of it ; and the protector of France confided it to Medici, adding that, as neither Farnese nor his friends had asked for his aid, he intended at present to remain silent with regard to Cesi. Little by little, however, he abandoned this reserve, and as the Spanish ambassador appeared to favour Farnese, so D'Este became a closer ally of Medici. From that moment the chances of the senior cardinal went down, and the election of his friend Savello appeared no longer to be in doubt. This was, short of the tiara, placing the supreme power in the hands of Farnese. Medici was beaten. Reduced to this cruel extremity, he conceived another plan.

It had been previously agreed upon with D'Este, who could dispose of the French cardinals, with Altemps, who was the head of the creatures of Pius IV., and with Alessandrino, head of the creatures of Pius V., that the two latter cardinals should form an 'inclusion,' that is, that they should draw up a list of candidates selected among the creatures of their respective Popes, Pius IV. and V., and that the four united chiefs should agree to one name chosen from the list. Thus Medici hoped to paralyse the action of San Sisto and the Gregorians, who were in favour of Farnese, but especially of Savello. He was mistaken. The last faction showed itself stronger than his own coalition, and it was necessary then to find other means of neutralising the Gregorians.

Altemps had not ceased his negotiations with San Sisto. By the help and at the instigation of Medici, he managed to make an arrangement with Gregory's two nephews, by which the three cardinals, himself, San Sisto, and Guastavillani, should be at liberty to choose their candidates among the creatures of Pius IV. and Gregory XIII., but could not give their votes to any other competitors, except upon an understanding between the three. As Farnese and Savello had been promoted by Paul III., and Altemps had engaged himself to Medici, D'Este, and Alessandrino (which fact he kept back from the other two cardinals, San Sisto and Guastavillani) to vote for creatures only of Pius IV. and Pius V., the senior cardinal and his friend Savello were indirectly but positively put aside.

In all human conflicts, whether it be on the battle-field, in a siege, at the bedside of the sick, where death and life are struggling for supremacy, or in diplomatic contests, which are not less angry because they take place at the corner of a window or round a green table, there is always one point, the important point, which the multitude cannot see, but which the man of genius seizes at once, never loses sight of, and upon which he concentrates his whole defensive or attacking forces, whilst he varies the means according to the requirements of the moment. This clear-sightedness, which we might call the gift of diagnostics, constitutes the great politician, the great commander, the great doctor, and constituted Medici a great intriguer. Neither willing nor able to be brought forward as a candidate for the tiara, he pursued but one object—to make those fail who were hostile to his country and to himself, and among these Farnese and Savello, both being the most hostile of the number, and the latter because he would leave the power to Farnese. The scene changed daily, in fact hourly, but, thanks to his extraordinary perspicacity, he soon perceived the weak point in his adversary. As he had centred all his hatred on two heads, and subsequently admitted several candidatures, his action as regards exclusion became hostile and peremptory, and, as regards inclusion, both uncertain and hesitating. He did not lavish his means to favour one competitor more than another. He aimed at the most important object, which was the immediate fall of Farnese. He endeavoured to hit him first by excluding the princes and the house of Austria, and by waiting for the answer from Prague, excluding the cardinals. To obtain this end he tried to get the co-operation of the two nephews of the late Pope, and through them of the Gregorians. But since San Sisto was not to be gained over, Medici at once modified his plan of attack in the very face of the enemy, and tried to separate the creatures of Gregory from their chief, which was only possible by spreading disunion in the Pope's family, by separating Guastavillani and Giacomo from San Sisto, the one the most popular of the two, the other the most resolute, inasmuch as his existence was in danger, the most active and most disposed to commit violent acts, as well as best able to commit them if necessary, since he held in his hands the reins of the army, of which he was the head.

This first campaign was not very successful. Most of the Gregorians remained faithful to San Sisto. The Farnesians, whether in the person of their chief, or, as is more probable, in that of Savello, were about to win the day. Again Medici, aided by his marvellous clear-sightedness, perceived the weak point of the enemy, appreciated what an important acquisition Altemps would be, persuaded him to place himself between San Sisto and the Farnesians, and succeeded by the ingenious contrivance we have described in striking Farnese and Savello from the list of competitors.

It is true that the victory was not a decisive one. To become so, the double exclusion should be maintained in the Conclave, and San Sisto must vote only for one candidate approved of by Cardinal Altemps, while the author of the trap into which San Sisto had fallen was full of hopes and proud 'to have deceived his adversaries, as was the will of God.'¹ Ferdinand de' Medici would undoubtedly deserve our admiration had he applied his ability to the service of a better cause, if an object could justify the means to obtain it, and if the cardinal had remembered that he was a prince of the Church rather than a prince of Tuscany.

Farnese, on the other hand, had not been inactive. He frankly came forward as a candidate, and did not make a secret of his hopes, without, however, appearing confident. He sought to increase the number of his partisans, among whom were already San Sisto, Caraffa, Lancelotto. He recalled to the memory of M. de Pisany,¹ who, believing him to be protected by Spain, was lukewarm as regards his candidature, certain engagements entered into by Henry III. in the event of his success. He told everyone he had no time to wait, and exchanged with Medici, who in these critical times approached him only once, polite phrases, and believed himself safe on hearing from Olivarès² that Philip's suspicions, which were so terrible an obstacle to the fulfilment of his wishes, had disappeared and made room for a friendly neutrality. Is it astonishing, then, that the heart of the ambitious old man should be buoyed with hope? As the senior cardinal and vice-chancellor, he held the first post in the Sacred College; as a Farnese one of the first positions in Italy. Authority, riches, the rare qualities which were his characteristics, entitled him to be the born candidate of every Conclave. Since the death of his own Pope, he had successively seen on the throne and in the vaults of St. Peter, Julius III., Marcellus II., Paul IV., Pius IV., Pius V., and Gregory XIII. In many Conclaves he was on the eve of becoming Pope without ever succeeding absolutely, and he had been called the Pope-maker. The new religious world issued from the reactionary Catholic movement, with the Jesuits at their head, the great names in literature and in the arts of which he was the Mæcenas, the Roman public with whom he was an object of adoration, all claimed for him the honour of becoming Pope. Religion, sciences, arts, popular favour, pleaded on his behalf. The Sacred College, wherein he had numerous friends, would, it was hoped, be influenced by that public opinion which is so powerful though so changeable (it was not so with respect to him), against which one should only go when one's convictions are strong, and which those who have not any, and who constitute the majority, invariably follow—this being the secret of the strength of public opinion. No candidate was ever more justified in believing that success would attend his appearance before the electors.

The life of Cardinal Farnese, son of Duke Pietro Luigi di Parma, brother of the reigning duke, and uncle of the illustrious soldier then in command of Philip's army of Flanders, embraces the whole of that long epoch which was so remarkable for its numberless events, for having seen Charles V., Francis I., and all those great religious and political transformations of which England, Germany, and Europe constituted the field. At the age of fourteen he first appeared upon the stage of life. At twenty he was for the first time in Flanders, living in the intimacy¹ of the great Emperor, afterwards with Francis I., and began to treat of the weightiest state matters, and between the most illustrious personages of that epoch. He treated of peace between Charles and Francis, of the state of England, which it was always hoped would be made to return to her allegiance to the Church, and of all the interests that then affected the world. Back again in Rome, he witnessed his own political growth, and became the centre of intellectual life, as well as the patron of the arts, which were still led, until the second half of the century, by the last survivor of the golden age, Michael Angelo, of whom he was the friend and the protector. After a not faultless youth, he felt the effects of the reaction, was influenced by it, sought the friendship of Ignatius Loyola, Francis Borgia,² Philip Neri, and became transformed with the times he lived in, and the atmosphere which he breathed. The masterpieces inspired by him, and brought out through his princely liberality, as well as the monuments which have called for the admiration of posterity, and have immortalised, together with the name of Alexander Farnese, those of their authors—Michael Angelo, Baldassare Peruzzi, Pierino del Vaga, Sebastiano del Piombo, the brothers Della Porta, Vignola—mark every phase in the intimate and public existence of this great cardinal during his long life, from the end of the dying Renaissance to the great Catholic reaction, the beginning of which he had witnessed as a boy, the progress of which he had watched as a man, and the success of which he had seen at the time when he was preparing to ascend a throne thence to descend into the tomb.

Arts follow, but never precede, the revolutions of the human mind. They preserved in Rome the print of the Pagan genius which had inspired them in the preceding century long after the Church and the State had entered a new line. The decoration of the palace belonging to the cardinal¹ in Rome is a striking proof of this. The tomb of Paul III., a masterpiece of William della Porta, displeased the reformed generations of the following century, and had to be veiled. It is only now tolerated inside St. Peter's because of its classical beauty, the charms of which the Church does not disdain.² Other compositions, which date from the first portions of the life of Farnese, contrast with those of a more advanced age, with the time of pious foundations, colleges, hospitals, with the style and ornamentation of the churches he built, and especially with the last and grandest of all, the magnificent temple which, during the two next centuries, became the prototype of sacred architecture—the Church of Jesus.

He never lived in his own palace, where workmen and artists were ever at work, but in the Chancellor's palace in Rome. In the spring he inhabited the Casino Palatino, which he had transformed into a museum, on the very spot and in the midst of the ruins of the palace of the Cæsars; in the summer, his country house of Palo, at the sea-side; and during the Ottobrate or October holidays, Grotta Ferrata or Caprarola, another masterpiece of his favourite architect, Vignola, and very dear to the Romans. In each of these places he kept open house, and received with proverbial kindness all the most important personages of Rome or abroad.¹ It was his pleasure to be surrounded by artists and learned men, who hastened to enjoy that magnificent and refined hospitality, the charms of which were still more enhanced by the personal amiability of him who bestowed it.

Though mixed up, especially in his youth, in some of the most important transactions of the day, Farnese has left no trace of his political activity. His name has not been attached to any of the events of the day. He was a prince rather than a great man, and certainly a great cardinal, possessing, with many rare qualities, one of the most precious gifts in a man, that of perfect amiability. Though often the object of envy, of spite, and subjected to small and even great persecutions, as those are who have risen from the people, he knew not what rancour was; and it is said of him that he never revenged himself. Pietro Maffei, a contemporary writer says of him, 'Nullas unquam ultus inimicorum injurias.'

He was tall, and, like every member of his family, particularly handsome. His features were noble, and his majestic demeanour when taking part in church ceremonies could not fail to strike one. In ordinary life, his grace, his somewhat worldly elegance of manner, reminded the spectator of old courts—of those already remote times of Julius II. and Leo X. which he had not seen, but a ray from which still shone while he was a youth upon the habits of the inmates of the Palace San Marco¹ the favourite residence of Paul III.

Gregory's obsequies were at an end. During the first days of the interregnum, public order had not been disturbed, but symptoms of uneasiness warned the illustrious electors (they were not styled Eminences until the following century) that there was danger abroad. One morning,² notwithstanding the formal order of the three cardinals regent which prohibited his coming to Rome, Prosper Colonna was seen in the streets of the capital with a troupe of thirty men, which increased to two thousand during the short journey from the Colonna Palace to where Cardinal de' Medici lived. Alarmed by this excess of popularity, and afraid lest he should be stopped by Signor Giacomo, Prosper thought it prudent to go home in a shut carriage, and the next day, to leave for Zagarola. Matters were on the stretch. Everyone felt it was time that this uncertainty should cease, yet the electoral proceedings had not commenced. There was therefore a great haste to begin the Conclave. Supposing that all the agreements entered into were kept, the following would have been the results of the election. Farnese and Savello were excluded, Cesi had little chance, and Sirletto was altogether abandoned. The votes were to be spread among numerous candidates, none of whom mustered a sufficient quantity to become a serious candidate, one alone excepted, and he one who had been least thought of, whom no cardinal, excepting perhaps Alessandrino and Rusticucci, favoured, but whom no one absolutely rejected; who, with the exception of a few timid steps taken with Farnese, had completely kept in the dark; whom circumstances and the difficulty of agreeing to another name, whom the force of events and not the will of the electors, put forward at the last moment, and whose chances are summed up in two words by the French ambassador¹ in writing to his sovereign: 'There is a Cordelier monk who has a very good chance; but the Spanish faction will like to have a Pope who shall be partial to them, not to the universal good.' That monk was Montalto.

CHAPTER III.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CONCLAVE.¹

THE Church of St. Peter, the Vatican, and the piazza which extends at the foot of these celebrated monuments, were not then what they are now-a-days. To the north-east, and towards the Porta Angelica, two little archways and a group of houses of mean appearance, in one of which Raphael died, occupied the ground upon which was built, in the succeeding century, one of the two splendid colonnades of Bernini, and where already the Palace of Rusticucci (Accoramboni) was being built, just at the end of the Borgo Nuovo. The Obelisk of Heliopolis, which was then called the Needle, still standing, to the right of the Basilica, but partly buried in the ruins of Nero's Circus, was waiting the call of Sixtus V. to throw off the dust which had covered it for fifteen centuries, and to take up its place in the centre of the piazza. Broad steps, at each extremity of which ² were statues of St. Peter and St. Paul, led to a building of the fourth century, which had three gates of old 'Roman' style, and in its upper part three double-arched windows. It still bore traces of mosaics, and on the side of the Vatican was next to a fine building of

Paul II. called the Paradise Garden, because in its inclosure, which was full of trees, pilgrims were wont to find what they most appreciated—water and shade. The front of this delightful Paradise was formed of three superposed colonnades, which exactly imitated the Venetian Palace built under the same Pope and by the same architect, Giulano da Majano. Towards the south-west, a small two-storied palace with three windows on each story, united the southern front of the building to a fine Florentine monument of Pius II., which consisted of two superposed arches at right angles with the old Saxon quarter, a little before the spot where now-a-days the south side of the Bernini Colonnade is joined to the church. On entering the court through one of the three gates of the central edifice, the visitor found himself before the golden basilica, which struck him by its simple magnificence, and by its character, which still bore all the marks of the early Christian ages. An archway, as broad as the church itself, led up to it. The front was ornamented with five windows on the first story and three on the upper one, each one arched and trefoiled together with a ‘rosace’ in the centre. Behind and above this venerable edifice, which had seen Christianity ascend the throne and take official possession of the world, rose other wonders, in fulfilment of Michael Angelo’s promise, which constituted the triumph of art in the service of faith. These wonders were the gallery, which remind us of the Pantheon, and which, built at a prodigious height above the Tombs of the Apostles, still awaited the gigantic cupola which was to crown it, and which it was to receive from Sixtus V. In the court-yard, a dais, supported by antique columns, overhung the well of the holy Pope Symmachus. A massive construction of Paul II., with guelf windows, also a copy of the façade of the Venetian Palace, encircled the yard on the north-east side. The house opposite, which was of the same architectural build, was the habitation of the cardinal archpriest of St. Peter.

In the interior of the basilica, much progress had been made in its transformation, first under the personal direction of Michael Angelo, and after his death from his drawings, which were faithfully copied. Paul V., struck by a witty rather than a wise saying,¹ was the first to give up the plans of the great master, and to substitute Carlo Maderno, who was rather a great mason than a great architect. He was also the first to replace the Greek by the Latin Cross, and in order to effect this, to pull down, with the Well of Symmachus, the front and Archway of Constantine, and altogether to do away with these buildings, which history and the piety of centuries had made sacred. Upon this now spare ground were to be built the new arcade, the first half of the great nave, and the façade which we now see.

Though the works had almost never been interrupted, since their commencement under Julius II. up to the time when Alexander VII. consecrated the new church, divine service was always performed; but no generation, during these hundred and twenty years, ever saw the church otherwise than divided into compartments by immense curtains, and filled with workmen and scaffolding. Proud to become some day the possessor of the great marvel of modern art and of the Christian world, Rome, with her religious, sarcastic, patient character—patient indeed because she could measure the future by her past which is lost in immensity—watched with sympathising curiosity these works which were ever progressing without coming to an end, controlled them by her always clever and sometimes sarcastic criticisms, and became little by little accustomed to appreciate each pontificate according to the progress which St. Peter's had made in its construction during their respective reigns.

The Vatican is composed of two palaces. The old, called the Belvedere, had since the middle of the century, that is since the death of Julius III., ceased to be the habitation of the Popes. On their return from Avignon they had restored it. Innocent VIII. especially had done a great deal to it. The apartment which he occupied preserved his name till the end of the last century, when it was converted into the Pio-Clementino Museum. It consisted of a big room, now called the Animals' Room, and of a series of passage-rooms or ante-chambers, in which sat the people of distinction. These rooms, knocked into one long gallery, are now called Cleopatra's Corridors. The next room, that of the statues, is the old bed-room of the Popes; and the last room was the confidential servant's room. The chapel wherein the Popes used to say mass is now the 'Sala del Torso.' That celebrated antique occupies the centre of the room, and Scipio's sarcophagus the spot whereon the altar stood. The arms of the Cibo, which are still visible in the centre of the ceiling, and a few frescoes of the reign of Pope Julius III., recall the primitive destination of the room. The wonderful view of the Eternal City from the balcony of the old chapel has caused that part of the Vatican to be justly called the Belvedere. The small and pretty court which was rebuilt by Bramante, and, with very few changes, has been preserved as it was, contained in the reign of Julius II. a number of valuable statues. He had conceived the idea of collecting and saving the masterpieces of antiquity, and thus laid the foundation, to which not much was added during three centuries, of that which became afterwards absolutely the richest and most valuable collection of antiquities in the world.

These were almost suddenly collected under Clement XIV. and Pius VI. through the intelligence, activity, and good luck of a remarkable man. The Genoese Giovanni Battista Visconti was the founder of that family of archæologists who have been so well known and appreciated by all who have visited Rome for the last hundred years. A friend of Winkelmann, he had offered to get up in Rome a finer museum of antiques than anything of the kind in other capitals, even in Naples, which was then, since the recent discovery of the ruins of Pompeii, the rendezvous of all the artists and learned of Europe. With the aid of the munificence of Popes Ganganelli and Braschi, Visconti formed the Pio Clementino Museum. He turned the old palace into a gallery, and caused, alas! the frescoes of Pinturichio, Mantegna, and Giovanni Udine to be removed. Arts, sciences, and humanity, which all gain by the contemplation of the beautiful, are deeply indebted to both Pontiffs and to Visconti, but it is somewhat characteristic of the exaggerated love of antiquity which was peculiar to the eighteenth century, that, without shocking the public, all the divinities of Olympus were allowed to be deposited in places hallowed by such pious reminiscences, and to invade even the habitation and chapel of the Popes. So true is it that in times of peace and security, the pleasures of taste and of the mind prevail, until affliction and danger re-establish a proper equilibrium and set matters to rights. Trials were not long coming; and if the succeeding Popes continued to be the first Mæcenases of their day, they no longer located their antiques in the apartments which their predecessors had occupied, or in chapels.

A long flight of badly paved stairs, a portion of which still remains, began at the south-west angle of the Piazza St. Peter, and, winding round the church, left the tower of the Observatory¹ to the right, and terminated at the old Palace of the Belvedere, near the new buildings added by Visconti to the apartments of Innocent VIII. It was along this alley that the processions of the Popes could be seen, followed by the cardinals and their equipages, the priests and the more or less numerous retainers of Roman nobles, according to the degree of popularity of the sovereign.

The new palace was contiguous to the Borgia apartment on the side of the basilica, and to a cluster of dull houses of the Middle Ages and the fifteenth century. It was composed of the buildings of Julius II. together with the stanze and loggie of Raphael, of the Sistine

Chapel of Sixtus IV., of the Sala Regia, of the Pauline Chapel built under Paul III.—who also caused the great staircase to be built, which was afterwards replaced by that of Bernini—and of the ducal and ‘adorning’ chambers.

To place the old and new palaces in communication with each other, Julius II. had had two long galleries, with open arches (now walled up), built by Bramante. Between these two galleries and the two palaces, there existed an oblong court of considerable length, arranged as an amphitheatre and ornamented by the great niche of the Belvedere. The wonderful effect produced by such a position, decorated with all the taste of Michael Angelo, has been done away by the two transversal buildings which were erected: the one, the library, by Sixtus V.; the other, the ‘braccio nuovo’ of the museum, by Pius VII.

The great ceremonies took place in the ‘stanze,’ and the throne-room was the room of Constantine. There it was, and since Paul III. in the Sala Regia it is, that all the magnificence of the temporal power has been displayed, that sovereigns have been received by the Pope, that ambassadors on their arrival presented their credentials, after previously spending the night at the Villa Giulia, outside the People’s Gate, and after crossing Rome with an immense retinue.

The ‘loggie’ were a kind of cloak-rooms and lobbies. Gregory XIII. built and lived in the apartment called Mathilda¹ in the new palace.

¹ Opposite Pius IX.’s staircase, towards the north, on the second floor, it extends from the hall of the consistory to the stanza of Constantine,

The east wing, now inhabited by the Pope and Secretary of State, did not then exist. Sixtus V. built it, and Clement VIII. was the first to inhabit it.

The apartments were hung with pieces of Arazzi tapestry, many of which to this day adorn the great staircase and lobby of the palace on the occasion of the Feast of Corpus Christi. The furniture was exceedingly simple. There were small wooden chairs, such as are now to be seen in the entrance halls of the Vatican and of some princely residences. The Pope's cabinet contained nothing but what remains there now—the Pope's arm-chair and table, placed under a canopy of red damask, and a stool, upon which the cardinals and ambassadors who came to see him sat. The bed-room furniture agreed with the austere tastes of Pius V., Gregory XIII., and Sixtus V. It is only under the Popes that succeeded these, under Clement VIII. and Paul V., that the splendour of the sovereign pervaded the habitation of the pontiff.¹

The Sistine Chapel, where already might be seen the 'Last Judgment' of Michael Angelo, the Pauline, and the Sala Regia, which is contiguous to each, and for which a room decorated with frescoes by Fiesole was sacrificed, and consists of a chapel, two large rooms and three small ones, opening on to the loggie of Gregory XIII., and on the north side upon the Campagna.

¹ 'The Pope's stanze,' says a French writer who visited Rome in the time of Paul V., 'look to the south on the gardens, and in these stanze there are many beautiful cabinets, clocks, paintings on alabaster, and an agate surrounded by lapis lazuli.' The Pope's bed was then covered over with red damask cloth, with broad gold fringes. In the room there was a low chimney-piece, an ivory crucifix of excellent French workmanship, which had cost the Pope only 180 scudi. It was a Cristo moribondo. formed, in all their splendour and freshness, the centre of the official scene where the conclaves were held. These, however, in later times were held at the Quirinal.

The ducal room, so called because the ambassadors of reigning dukes had their first audience in it, and where the consistories were held, the loggie, and small adjoining apartments, were divided into cells by means of wooden partitions. These were the habitations of the cardinal-electors. The door leading into the Sala Regia from the grand staircase was called the door of the Conclave, and while the Conclave lasted it was never opened. In other places, revolving boxes, called holes, served the purpose of passing to each cardinal his food, which was brought to him from his own palace. Here, on an express request, and only in very urgent cases, were the ambassadors admitted and allowed to confer with the cardinals of their respective countries. It is needless to add that curiosity found means, although in a very limited degree, to peep through these holes, and to gather for the information of Rome intelligence probably furnished by some indiscreet conclavists.¹ It was, however, and is still the custom that a summary absolution given by the newly-elected Pope quiets all consciences with respect to slight infractions of the very severe laws on this subject which may have been committed.

The ten days which, according to the prescriptions

of Gregory IX. and of Pius IV. should pass between the death of the Pope and the meeting of the Conclave, had elapsed. The invitations to absent cardinals had duly been sent. The Vatican was ready to receive its hosts. According to law, apartments are drawn by lots. As the senior cardinal, Farnese had asked for that which Innocent VIII. had occupied; but on the proposal of Cardinal de' Medici, who feared lest this distant cell might favour the intrigues of his rival, it was given to the cardinal of Austria.

On April 21, Easter Sunday, the cardinals met at St. Peter's, heard the mass of the Holy Ghost, listened to a speech 'de Eligendo Pontifice,' delivered by Marcantonio Moretto, one of the preachers then in renown, and subsequently proceeded in procession to the Vatican. Classified into bishops, priests, and deacons, preceded by the Cross, they paraded through the Basilica, which was crowded to excess, ascended, between a double line of privileged sight-seers, the steep grand staircase of San Gallo, entered the Sa'a Regia, and thence into the various cells which each had caused to be furnished for him and hung in violet at a cost, it was said, of 300 scudi, with the wish, if not the hope, of seeing it pillaged at the end of the Conclave by the servants of the Vatican, to whom belonged by right the furniture of the elected Pope.

Thirty-nine electors were brought together. Cardinals Andrew of Austria, Madruccio, and Vercelli had arrived on the following days, and increased the number to 42. Farnese, D'Este, Alessandrino, Altemps, Medici, and San Sisto were, as Popes' nephews, their natural leaders. San Sisto disposed of most votes. Farnese, Savello, Sirletto, Paleotto, Santa Croce, Cesi, Santorio, Torres, Altemps, Mondovi, Castagna, and Montalto were the candidates of public opinion—were the eligible ones in fact.

Savello, the only cardinal for whom the late Pope had shown some sympathy, though respectable, had few friends in the Sacred College. His annoying ways, his loquacious spirit, made him unpopular. In high repute at Madrid, he aimed at the tiara, and was confident of success. Belonging to one of the four principal noble families of Rome, he was one among the great cardinals, lived in his palace at the Borgo, and in summer in his magnificent villa of Castel Gandolfo, which became later the residence of other Popes.

Sirletto, a holy man in the strictest sense of that word, was much loved. He was compared to Charles Borromeo. He spent in charities two-thirds of his modest means, while his piety and his goodness were not less proverbial than his charity. His too strongly marked leaning to Spain, and the fear lest he should allow the direction of affairs to fall again into the hands of Como, who was generally detested, had greater weight, in the opinion of the electors, than his moral qualities, which made of him a model prince of the Church, but might probably have turned him into an indifferent head.¹

Paleotto, a native of Bologna, a professor of law, a celebrated lawyer, had shone at the Council of Trent, and was later, at the conclave of Gregory XIV., to fail in obtaining the tiara by one vote. He was considered one of the most noted ecclesiastics in the promotion of reform, and in the eyes of the public as one of the most eligible. His name was not even mentioned in the Conclave, so great was the general horror for Bologna men, who had been too much favoured during the pontificate of Gregory XIII.

Finally there was the 'frate,' the monk as he was called, 'a grey friar called Montalto,' as the French ambassador said, the son of a gardener, once one of the itinerant preachers most in renown, and later a cardinal not much liked by Gregory. He lived a retired existence, taking care of his vineyards, and obsequious towards his colleagues, many of whom affected to take no notice of him ; he was the object of public attention though he tried to escape it, and was much considered, notwithstanding the envious, the wicked, and the indifferent who constitute the great number, but happily not always the majority, when the decisive moment has come.

Besides the 'eligible' ones, the Sacred College had many candidates among its members who were celebrated. Madruccio, Archbishop of Trent, charged with the interests of the Emperor and the King of Spain in the Conclave, protector of German ecclesiastical affairs, was looked upon as sharing with D'Este and the old and infirm Granvella, soon after prime minister of Philip II., the reputation of being a great statesman

After the death of his brother Frederic, he for some years carried on the duties of ambassador in his palace of the Borgo.¹ He himself inhabited the Massa Palace, Piazza Navone, where all the political celebrities and foreigners of distinction were wont to congregate. The palace stood on the spot where the Doria Pamphili Palace, built by Innocent X., now stands. He was known for his amiability, his elevated sentiments, his affable ways, his charities. Besides these moral qualities, he had physical advantages¹—a high stature, a noble deportment, and an intelligent countenance. His body rests not far from that of Tano in the Church of San Onofrio, of which he was the diocesan, and where an inscription still preserves his remembrance. His eldest brother, Fortunato, the head of that illustrious family, now extinct, continued, as Lord of Ala, the manners and ways of the Middle Ages in the mountains of Southern Tyrol and on the Lake of Garda. He gave protection to banditti, and thus created great difficulties for his brothers the cardinal and the ambassador, who were ever obliged to protect him against the wrath of the Republic of Venice, the complaints of the Pope, and the powerless threats of the Holy Empire.²

Gesualdo, a Neapolitan nobleman, was one of the most ardent reformers, the founder of St. Andrea della Valle, which the grand-nephew of Sixtus V. completed, and one of the ornaments of the Sacred College. Magnificent in his ways, he lived a most austere life, and was most careful of his person. His colleagues, who were less so perhaps, were wont to 'chaff' him on the subject of his excessive love of cleanliness in the presence of Gregory himself.

Besides Montalto, three future Popes, Castagna, Sfondrati, Facchinetti, took part in the Conclave. The reigning families were represented by Andrew of Austria, whose modesty, hereditary¹ affability, and kindness made him very popular, by Medici and by Farnese. The Roman aristocracy were represented by Colonna, Savello, Cesi, Lancelloti, and Santa Croce. The Holy Empire had for its representatives the cardinals of Austria, Madruccio, and Altemps (Hohenembs): France, Rambouillet and Pelvé, Cardinal of Sens, the confidential ambassador of the League at the Holy See, the clever, active, and implacable enemy of the King of Navarre. He was destined not to survive the triumph of 'the Bearnaise,' and died of disgust in his beautiful hotel of Sens, in the Marais, while the bells were ringing in honour of the entry of Henry IV. into Paris. Spain was represented by Seza, who belonged to one of the great families of the country, and was allied to the royal house of Portugal, a true type of the old Castilian, and a bigoted enemy of France. He had built and lived in the beautiful palace which became afterwards the property and residence of the Borghese,

¹ Novæes, in his history of the Roman pontiffs, styles him the natural son of the Archduke of Tyrol. That is not exact. and was wont at times to amuse himself, and as a mark of his (in this case very inoffensive) antipathy for France, by violently knocking Spanish and French coins together, crying out 'Guerra! guerra!' until he was exhausted, and separated the combatants by calling out, 'Paz! paz!' He was an eccentric man, who had his value, and whom it was not well to despise, especially in a Conclave.¹

Como, Altemps, Alessandrino, Rusticucci, are known by the influence which they possessed under the pontificates of Pius IV. and Pius V.

Como's star was on its decline, and about to disappear altogether. Altemps, owing to his being a lord of the Holy Empire, was still to be before the public. Alessandrino² had begun by being a tailor's apprentice, had become a Dominican to avoid the ill-treatment of his master, and was made a cardinal by his uncle Pius V., who likewise appointed him Secretary of State, without, however, altogether abandoning to him the management of state affairs. He lived on the Piazza of the Apostles, in the Palazzo Valentini, one of the fine palaces of Rome, which is still unfinished, and which was to occupy a portion of Trajan's forum. His amiability and gentleness, combined with a certain knowledge of the world, had gained for him the friendship of several cardinals. His uncle's creatures gathered around him, and made of him one of the most important members of the Conclave.

Pope was still a cardinal, belonged, as did Alessandrino, and all the cardinals created by Pius V., to the zealous faction. He was very intimate with D'Este, and reappeared for awhile in the political world under Sixtus V. His palace, which he built himself, was situated at the entrance of the Piazza of St. Peter, and was in the new style, that is, in the baroque style.

In the opinion of contemporaries, generally so severe with regard to the Sacred College, that venerable body was well composed. It shone by the Christian virtues, prevalent piety, knowledge, and good feeling of all its members. The great cardinals spent their large revenues well. It was, however, said, with some tincture of reproach, that among the learned cardinals there were more lawyers than theologians. If Medici, blinded by his hatred of Farnese, had given some scandal during the last days to those who knew his intrigues, their reprobation, as well as the blame put upon him by his brother, out of prudence, is in praise of the Sacred College, which was evidently looked upon as inaccessible to corruption by those best able to appreciate it.

It was still daylight when the cardinals entered their respective cells. They might therefore have gone back to their palaces, and have returned in the evening. But the coalition which had been formed two days before between the Medici-Alessandrino and Altemps-San Sisto factions kept everyone on the alert. The fear of some unexpected combination, or of some sudden proposal made at the last moment, kept the electors riveted to their posts.

The evening was spent in paying visits, in exchanging commonplace observations, in paying the usual compliments, and in receiving ambassadors come to present their respects and give their last instructions to the cardinals belonging to their respective countries. A long talk between Count Olivarés and Cardinal de Sens was much noticed. There took place likewise an a parte conversation between the Marquis Pisany and Cardinal Farnese. As the French ambassador was wishing him good-bye, the Cardinal, by way of justifying his intimacy with the Spanish partisans, whispered into Pisany's ear that he 'must know under what obligation he was to the Spanish crown, which had in its hands the restitution of the fortress of Parma, and an infinite number of other matters which were as important as the maintenance of his house.'¹

Warned by the three bells that the time for entering the cells had come, the ambassadors at last retired. At four o'clock of the night (ten or eleven P.M. now-a-days) the Conclave was shut. D'Este, Medici, and Alessandrino, who had resolved to act in concert, but were not yet agreed as to how to do it, endeavoured to secure the co-operation of Altemps. The latter, in return for the aid which Alessandrino had given him on the occasion of Gregory's election, had engaged himself to meet his wishes in the next Conclave; but at this critical moment, he was found, on inquiry, to be little disposed to remember his promise. It required all the eloquence of Medici to recall it to his memory. On the other hand, Alessandrino had reasons to suspect the latter, and it was only by threatening to join Farnese that he got some reassuring words from Medici. These conversations were prolonged, and naturally attracted the attention of the other electors and of the conclavists, who were even more curious than their masters, so that everybody remained awake, and the cardinals spent a bad night.

With the public, however, Montalto was the favourite; but the initiated, or rather those who believed themselves to be such, prelates and courtiers, believed that Medici would oppose him on account of his brother-in-law, Paolo Giordano Orsini,¹ the lover of Vittoria Accoramboni, and the supposed assassin of that lady's husband, who was no other than the nephew of the cardinal-monk, Francesco Peretti.

The following morning (the 22nd) the cardinals assembled in the Pauline Chapel, and received communion at the hands of the senior cardinal, Farnese. Thence they went to the Sistine Chapel, to proceed to the ballot, which produced no result. Each prelate then retired to his cell. The event of the day was the arrival of the cardinal of Austria. Notwithstanding his stoutness, he had travelled in six days the whole way from Innspruck to Rome. As soon as he arrived he went to the Vatican and asked admittance into the Conclave, which Farnese and San Sisto were disposed to refuse him, on the ground that he had not yet taken orders. But Medici, having smoothed these difficulties over, he entered, was complimented by everyone, and was at once, without his perceiving it, made use of by Medici, as will be seen, for the purpose of denying the candidature of Montalto and thus of lulling the vigilance of the Farnesians. Active but useless parleys took up the afternoon. The coalition cardinals concerted in favour of Cesi, and commissioned the Tuscan cardinal to gain D'Este over to his cause. This attempt having broken down, Sirletto was selected. But, while recognising the qualities and merits of this cardinal, D'Este opposed an energetic refusal, on the plea that he would not hear of a Spanish chaplain, who besides would let himself be guided by Como. Sirletto's candidature was therefore abandoned. Towards evening, alarming rumours spread throughout the Conclave. Another surprise was feared, and the first hours of night passed away before the cardinals could get any rest. At last these rumours were proved to be without foundation, and everyone went to bed.

In Rome itself the most contradictory rumours had been current during the day. Towards evening Farnese was said to be Pope, and to mark their pleasure the people ran through the streets shouting, 'Long live the Holy Father!' and, as if they were to extend to the Farnese Palace the right granted of pillaging the newly-elected Pope's cell, they at one time showed an intention to invade it. These hopes were soon dispelled, and made room for bitter disappointment. In the betting, odds had gone down as regards Montalto and Farnese, but risen in favour of Sirletto, while Savello was stationary.

On the 23rd, the Wednesday, the electors were more embarrassed, more puzzled than before, and afraid lest the Conclave should last for ever. Finding in the morning that his two candidates, Cesi and Sirletto, were definitively abandoned, Medici proposed Albani and Montalto to D'Este, leaving him the choice of either. D'Este felt that it was time to come to a decision ; that it would be imprudent to increase the number of his enemies by fresh exclusions ; that he could not depend on the co-operation of the French cardinals, who were still on the road, and might even be prevented by the League from coming. He therefore subscribed to the double candidature of Albani and Montalto, on condition, however, that Madruccio, head of the Spanish party, who was expected from one moment to another should consent to it. The Spaniards and Farnesians opposed this course violently. To counteract this, Medici, who now saw no means of salvation except in the election of Montalto, and in this election the only way to prevent that of Farnese or of Savello, had recourse to a stratagem. He made Cardinals Andrew of Austria, Deza, and others believe, and spread through them the belief, that, warned by the objections which existed against Montalto, he and his followers had resolved no longer to second the candidature of the latter.

Thus reassured, the adverse party took no more notice of him, and Medici thus attained his double end, which was to deceive the Farnesians and prevent a demonstration against Montalto, which might produce an effect upon the timid and undecided, cause them perhaps to join the enemy, and at that critical moment sink all the monk's chances. Time, however, was pressing, and Medici, who dreaded nothing so much as the arrival of Cardinals Madruccio and Vercelli, succeeded, not without some difficulty and with the help of Gesualdo, in intimidating Altemps, the head of the creatures of Pius IV., by making him believe that his adversary Ceneda might be elected; in bringing him and them to look favourably upon the creatures of Pius V., which was contrary to the engagement under which they were to San Sisto; and, finally, in leading him insensibly to declare himself in favour of Montalto. 'I see,' said Altemps, 'that you want the monk.' He urged in objection the enmity of Paolo Giordano Orsini, and was surprised that Medici should consent to expose his brother-in-law to the vengeance of Francesco's uncle; but these objections were of no avail, and ultimately Altemps was gained over, and made even to promise to speak of it to Madruccio.

That cardinal, who had that very day arrived in Rome at the twenty third hour (one hour before sunset), and had been visited by the ambassadors of Spain and of the Emperor, who besought of him to go at once to the Conclave, stopped but a few moments at his palace, 'just time enough to say a credo,' and was carried to the Vatican. A statesman, and still more a churchman, he felt that an exclusively Spanish Pope would be as little worthy of the high duties to be performed towards the whole of the Christian world as would an exclusively French Pope. He was resolved therefore to come to an understanding with D'Este, who, as we have seen, had, probably owing to similar considerations, made the assent of Madruccio a condition of his upholding the candidature of Montalto. Both these men, though belonging to the adverse political parties which then divided the Christian world, were above the petty intrigues, interested reservations, and pusillanimous fears that characterised many of those around them. They both shared the same view, that of giving to the Church a head able to govern it well, and therefore likely to be as impartial as possible, both with regard to France and to Spain. Opposed at first to Montalto, and preferring Sirletto, he gave up the latter when he learnt D'Este's opposition, and ended by declaring himself against Albani, and in favour of Montalto. Altampa, faithful to his promise, had been the first to speak to Madruccio in favour of the monk. Medici and Gesualdo next endeavoured to persuade him, and when convinced that he must bear with it, Madruccio felt that he must do so with grace. He found no difficulty in making Montalto the accepted candidate of the Spanish party, of Andrew of Austria, of Colonna, Seza, Spinola, Sfondrati, Gonzaga, and others. This great conquest once achieved, D'Este and Medici estimated the votes, and found that four were wanting to make up the required majority of two-thirds. These could only be looked for among the Gregorians, several of whom still held to Farnese. Meanwhile it was decided that on the following day, at 20 hours, the cardinals should meet in the Sala Regia, that thence they should all proceed to the Sistine Chapel, and endeavour to carry the election by 'adoration.' Thus ended that important day, which foreboded the end of the Conclave on the morrow. At midnight, Cardinal Alessandrino, with Rusticucci, the only cardinal who was sincerely devoted to Montalto, having put on the clothes of one of his conclavists, hoping thus, but in error, to escape the vigilance of his adversaries, went along the corridors, from cell to cell, to inform his friends of the resolution which had been taken as regards Montalto, and finally crept into the latter's cell to bring him the news. Montalto, who had already been warned by Medici of the measures which were being adopted in his favour, had abstained from taking any step. Retired in his cell, he waited in silence, following the advice of his protector and the dictates of prudence as well as of the exigencies of his position. For in every station of life, and on such occasions, those must wait till they are called upon who have nothing but personal merit to recommend them, and never put themselves forward. They can only hope for success through their merit, and this is admitted only under absolute necessity, under pressure of circumstances, and when circumstances, which are often stronger than the will, are inclined to favour merit.

Few bets were made in town on that day, but Montalto was looked upon as having the best chance. A kind of apathy, not unmixed with some indefinable fear lest the Conclave should last too long, had succeeded the preceding day's agitation. The minds of all were somewhat comforted on learning, however, that the provinces, as well as Rome, were quiet and the public peace had not been disturbed.

On Wednesday, the 24th of April, Cardinal de' Medici got up before daylight, called Montalto secretly into Gesualdo's room, and renewed to him the advice he had sent him the evening before and during the night. In fact he gave him his last instructions for the crisis which was preparing. He was surprised as well as pleased at the ignorance, security, and torpor in which the Farnesians and their chief appeared to indulge. But this was a mistake. Farnese knew all, but believed it not. He thought that Cardinal Montalto had not the remotest chance. While Medici was conferring with Montalto, the senior cardinal had an interview with D'Este, gave the latter to understand that he was aware of what was going on, and asked him what he intended doing. D'Este, somewhat disconcerted at being found out, replied that his vote would depend upon that of Altemps; that, besides, he would not dare venture on an opposition, since all the Gregorians (which was not true) had resolved to vote for the nephew of Pius IV. Unshaken by Farnese's objections, they separated, the former convinced, however, that Medici, out of consideration for his brother-in-law Orsini, would never encourage the election of the monk. On leaving Farnese, D'Este proceeded to the Sala Regia, and posted himself between the Pauline door and that which opened on the grand staircase. Altemps joined him there, under pretext of welcoming Cardinal Vercelli, who had arrived in Rome during the night. Everyone afterwards met in the Pauline Chapel, to hear mass and the reading of the bulls, in consequence of the arrival of Madruccio and Vercelli. Then it was that D'Este succeeded in gaining over to Montalto's cause Guastavillani (who, as we have said, was an important acquisition to make, owing to his being the nephew of the deceased Pope), Marcello, and Sforza, by telling them that they could decide who the Pope was or was not to be, and that in their own interest, in the interest of Paolo Giordano, all they had to do was to give their adherence. While these decisive conversations were taking place in the Sala Regia, the greater part of the cardinals had as usual assembled in the Sistine Chapel. D'Este sent Alessandrino to call San Sisto, who came at once, and showed much surprise and still more annoyance at the overtures which were made to him. He was shaken, however, when he found that the coalesced were resolved to carry the election by 'adoration,' even if he refused his co-operation. Having given as an excuse that matters were not yet ripe, that nothing could as yet be attempted which would not give rise to painful oppositions, nay even to scandalous scenes, he suddenly gave in, as is commonly the case on great occasions when all engaged feel that the crisis has come, some appearing exacting because they feel themselves victorious, others intimidated and waiving an opposition henceforth likely to be useless. San Sisto then gave in all of a sudden, and, as he had been asked to do, called for all the Gregorians, who, as we have said, were assembled in the Sistine Chapel, for the ballot. Medici, who was there, encouraged first by signs, then by words whispered into their ears, his late acquisitions, Guastavillani, Marcello, and Sforza, whom he saw wavering at that supreme moment, to follow the Gregorians. They at last got up and went out, followed by the sarcastic remarks of Cardinal Fanchinetti. Soon after the numerous cardinals who had thus been assembled together in the Sala Regia, returned to the chapel.

Then only did Farnese understand that he was beaten. He spoke a few words of reproach to D'Este and to Medici. These exhorted him to accept with good grace what was an accomplished fact, and D'Este, seeing everybody present, exclaimed, 'It is no longer necessary to have recourse to the ballot. The Pope is elected. Let us proceed to the adoration.' These words were received with unanimous and oft-repeated cries of 'Montalto!' and all the electors, with San Sisto at their head, threw themselves at the feet of the new Pope. The act of adoration was followed by the vote, which was conducted vivâ voce, each cardinal being called by name, and, as may readily be believed, was unanimous.

Thus ended the Conclave, in the midst of surprise, even from those who had prepared it; for no one doubted that, if the adoration had not been precipitated, seeing the vacillating character of San Sisto, Savello would have been Pope before nightfall.¹ 'To the details which at the time I have given your Serenity,' writes the ambassador Priuli,² 'I must add that the election of Sixtus V. is looked upon as the work of the Holy Ghost, all the cardinals having so promptly co-operated in his exaltation, notwithstanding that the nephews of Gregory and their numerous adherents must have preferred any other candidate, knowing as they did how ill-disposed he was to Gregory, against whom, and those who governed for him or were near his person, he spoke ill, even in Gregory's lifetime. Neither the enmity of Paolo Giordano Orsini, nor his endeavours with each cardinal of the Sacred College, to obtain, on his knees, from them that they should not elect Montalto, nor the aversion of the whole Court, which, remembering the severities of Pius V., was against a Pope who had been a monk, could prevail. Such attempts, and even greater considerations, are of no avail against the will of our Lord God.'

M. de Pisany wrote later to Pasquier: 'The death of Gregory XIII. happened, and the two Pope-makers (Cardinals d'Este and Farnese, to whom the others had variously promised their votes, D'Este favoured by France and the other by Spain) were somewhat troubled to find that they could not ensure the victory to the objects of their devotions, alias of their intrigues, but were finally obliged to adopt him who was furthest from the "dish," and upon whom no one in the Conclave had up to that time cast a look.'

It was on the Wednesday of Easter week, the 24th of April, at 13 hours (about 8 o'clock in the morning of our time), that Cardinal Montalto ascended the throne of St. Peter under the name of Sixtus the Fifth.

He owed his election to D'Este, Medici, Altemps, and also greatly to the pusillanimity and defection of San Sisto. Such did the Gregorians, in their anger against their chief, call his conduct, for, as has been seen, he had engaged simultaneously with Altemps only to uphold candidates selected from among the creatures of Pius V. and Gregory XIII., and not to give aid to any other competitor, except upon a mutual understanding between them all. Montalto had been made a cardinal by Pius V. In joining at the last moment the

D'Este-Medici faction, San Sisto had evidently broken his word. He had besides placed the Gregorians in the falsest position. They were obliged to follow him, and had to pass over to the enemy while the battle was raging.

This is exactly what they did, but they did so with shame and confusion, full of fear for the future, and discontent against their leaders, and still more against themselves—of all humiliations the worst. If a man willingly excuses a fault, it is seldom that he forgives himself a fault committed which is followed by serious and irreparable consequences.

From that moment began, in the midst of the Sacred College, a secret opposition to the new pontiff, which was based upon the rancours of the Gregorians, and which when it attracted the attention and later the suspicion of Sixtus V. brought down upon some of them the severity of the irascible Pope.

Medici, proud of having made the Pope, was already hoping to have the state affairs confided to his care. D'Este, though in a less degree, shared these illusory hopes. Sixtus looked upon himself as much more indebted to God than to man. He, however, received with smiles and kindness the congratulations, homage, and protestations of devotion which both cardinals offered him, but he knew how to act as regards them. He knew that Medici had principally adopted a negative course, that of obtaining the rejection of Farnese, rather than that of giving his support to Cesi and Sirletto. He knew that, finding how impossible it was to get one of these two cardinals named, he had proposed Albani and himself, and had only at last stood by him because he saw that no other cardinal, except Farnese or Savello, had the remotest chance of success. He was aware that D'Este and Madruccio, for like reasons, but also for higher motives, had accepted and not proposed his candidature; that the Gregorians had been beguiled by their chief, that others had come round to him, not through sympathy, but owing to the force of the current, which had become irresistible, and because they feared being compromised if they prolonged a useless resistance. He knew well what was his worth. He knew that everyone was aware of it; but, as a thorough master of the human heart, he also knew that his reputation as an enlightened character and an iron will was but a feeble recommendation to many an elector. He was aware that worth is appreciated only by people of worth, who are always in a minority; and that it was not therefore surprising that other candidates should be preferred to him, who gave rise to less jealousy, less apprehensions, and, on the contrary, gave larger securities for individual interests, which are often taken even by virtuous but not over clear-sighted men, and by an error which is excusable, for those of the public. In fact Montalto knew that an unforeseen assemblage of circumstances, each negatively favourable, had brought about his election.

The reader is acquainted with these circumstances. Shown into the Conclave, he has been able to catch the thread of the several intrigues carried on, to establish facts, dive into the most secret thoughts, and carefully disguised incentives to action which prompted the principal actors.

He has seen at work D'Este and Madruccio,¹ the two superior men of the assembly, both desirous to please their sovereigns without displeasing their colleagues, but each sacrificing in the end their interests to those of the Church, at the risk of falling in station if they should give themselves a superior man as master. He has watched Medici, the most adroit and least scrupulous of the cardinals; Altemps, the best politician; and the greater number of the electors, who no doubt believed themselves to be led by the Holy Ghost, and said so, but who were 'led by the nose' as Cardinal Fanchinetti told them openly when he saw them leave the Sistine Chapel, to prepare, in the Sala Regia, the surprise of the adoration.

The reader has been present at all this, but he has also noted that all these various changes, the hesitation of D'Este and of Madruccio, their subsequent intervention, the machinations of Medici, the duplicity of Altemps, the irresolution, coming and going from one camp to another of Guastavillani, the rallying of San Sisto, the petty intrigues, betrayals, and bickering, ended in the exaltation of a man who, the object of everybody's attention, was the candidate of nobody, and that the tiara was placed on the head of him who, in the opinion of his contemporaries and of posterity, best deserved to wear it.

¹ In a secret memoir (a 'statuor') previous to the Conclave, which gives an account of the personal feelings of the members of the Sacred College, Cardinal d'Este had called the attention of Villeroy upon Cardinal Madruccio, as a partisan of the French king. In a subsequent letter the Cardinal said, 'Nevertheless, as he has been appointed head of the Spanish faction in the Conclave, I think we must no longer look to him' (as a future candidate for the papacy, who might be accepted by France).—D'Este to Villeroy, Rome, May 8, 1585. CHAPTER IV.

THE FAMILY OF SIXTUS THE FIFTH.

IN one of the least frequented parts of the Marches, at about eighty kilometres south of Ancona, stands a small town, or rather burgh or 'castello,' as it is called in the country, situated on one of the crests of the Apennines. On the coast can be seen a few miserable huts, built at the end of the last century, when there was no longer any fear of the pirates. The trains on the Adriatic coast stop there a moment, but the travellers by them are in a hurry: they are on their way to Egypt, to India, or to the antipodes. Their contact is of too fugitive a character to be able to communicate to that distant corner of Italy the activity, ideas, and customs of the present day. After travelling through orange and lemon groves, and ascending some steep steps cut in the rock, the visitor comes to Grottamare, the birthplace of Sixtus V. In this old town everything reminds him of the great Pope: here the Via Peretti; there his colossal statue; in the middle the Church of St. Lucia, erected by his sister Donna Camilla, on the very spot where he was born.¹

A road, which has within the last few years become passable, leads, across a hilly country, to Montalto, which stands on the crest of a high mountain, and which, like Grottamare, has preserved its mediæval aspect. The progress of centuries has stopped there at the fifteenth and sixteenth.¹ At a distance of twenty minutes from this place, on an elevated spot, stands the Convent of the Cordeliers, where the young Felice Peretti took the habit of St. Francis at the age of nine years. For the second time the revolutionary torrent has dispersed all its inhabitants. When, in May 1867, I visited those spots, the old prior and another monk alone walked silently along the abandoned corridors of that decaying building. Some weeks

¹ The principal monuments, such as the unfinished cathedral, the old residence of the Legate, the seminary, are due to the munificence of Sixtus V. There are, besides, several lordly houses which bear the mark of the architectural transformation then going on.

It is beneath the roofs of the local aristocracy that those rare foreigners are received who visit the place, and these are mostly neighbours; for the tourist has not yet taken possession of these regions, still unknown to the traveller's handbook. At the Hôtel de Ville, there are portraits of the Pope, and some of Donna Camilla, of Cardinal Alexander Montalto, his grand-nephew, and Cardinal Francis Peretti, his great-grand-nephew. Curious letters of Frà Felice, and two letters signed by Donna Camilla, one dated 1589, the other 1602. The writing shows the character of the person who penned them. In the first letter can be traced the peasant's origin; the second proves, what history confirms—how well the gardener's daughter, the farmer's widow, could adapt herself to her new position as a Roman princess. There exists between the two writings all the difference that there is between the girl of the fields and the great lady, and yet it is no less apparent that the same person has written both.

The cathedral, built on a colossal substructure, consists of two churches, one over the other. The lower building, a simple, solid, and nobly proportioned edifice, was finished in the Pope's time. The upper church is being finished according to the designs of Domenico Fontana, the architect of Sixtus. The numerous foundations which the Pope instituted have mostly disappeared. There are, however, still a few properties, the revenues from which have preserved their original destination, and serve to endow four young girls with fifty scudi each.

had passed since the pious members of the community had left it, and already the symptoms of destruction were visible. The little garden was uncared for, wild plants were invading the alleys. Soon a desert will surround the monastery. From the convent a fine prospect opens itself to the view. First the venerable town itself, presenting a storied range of old houses, which are reddish and grey in the sun, violet and marbled in the shade; then a mass of defiles and dried-up ravines at one's feet; around, on the heights, where we breathe the fresh air of the Alps, water, shade, an exuberant vegetation; everywhere hills, covered with villages, surrounded by embattled walls; and in the far distance the sea on one side, the Apennines on the other, the highest mountains of Apulia on a third.

In this lovely country, between Grottamare and Montalto, Sixtus spent his youth. When the news of his election spread in Rome, people asked, not who he was, for that was well known, but whence he came. In town, as at Court, Cardinal Montalto was one of the best known characters. Outside Rome, though thirty or forty years ago he had so often traversed the Peninsula from beginning to end, the faithful who formerly had been electrified by his eloquence were no longer alive. The once celebrated preacher Frate Felice was almost forgotten. In Europe, beyond Italy, his name had never been mentioned, except perhaps in Madrid, whither he had gone with Cardinal Buoncompagni in the capacity of theologian, undoubtedly an important but comparatively secondary position. M. de Pisany also, in speaking of the candidates, called him, as has been seen, 'a Cordelier of the name of Montalto.'

This Montalto had just stepped from the Sistine Chapel to St. Peter's, and from St. Peter's to the apartments of Gregory XIII., there to instal himself as Head of the Church. His past had therefore to be scrutinized—a very natural curiosity, which it was difficult, however, to satisfy, so obscure was his origin. 'He was of such low birth,' says Giovanni Gritti, on his return from Rome, where he had been Venetian envoy, 'that his parents were scarcely remembered.' Lorenzo Priuli, on the morning after the election, wrote to the Doge: 'He was born in a castello yclept Grottamare, and his father was a gardener. Against the will of the latter he went to school, from the mere desire to know how to read and write. His father, unable to pay his expenses, wished to have him at home; but the child fled, and entered the novitiate of the minor brothers of Montalto, became later a great preacher, the General of his order, Bishop of St. Agatha and then of Fermo, and finally a cardinal.'

Such was the information which could be collected during the first days. Later, a mass of particulars were got together respecting his antecedents.¹ It became known that his family, of Slavonian origin, had come to Italy towards the middle of the preceding century, chased like so many others by the Turks, who, masters of Constantinople, overran Illyria and were threatening Dalmatia. Under the pontificates of Paul II. and Sixtus IV., from Ancona to Otranto numberless boats filled with immigrants were seen on the coast. Many arrived in the most helpless state of destitution, fell into the deepest misery, and died. Others, more fortunate, were able to acclimatise themselves. They founded in Rome, between the Corso and the Ripetta, then the Via Leonine, that miserable quarter called the 'Schiavonia.' Some of them remained on the coast of the Adriatic, mixed with the people of the country, adopted their language, and led humble existence. Zanetto was one of these. He established himself at Montalto, and had children who married into respectable families of the locality, occupied various posts in the municipality, thus took rank in the middle classes, and became, what the Italians call people of 'condizione civile.' Piergentile, the fourth descendant of the Dalmatian emigrant, was the father of the future Pope. He had seen better days before the taking and ruin of Montalto by the Duke of Urbino, in 1518. He sought refuge at Grottamare, where he farmed a few fields, gave himself up to husbandry, and became a gardener. Horticulture constitutes the principal industry of the inhabitants of that coast, protected as they are against winds, and enjoying as they do an exceptionally mild climate at the foot of the Apennines. Thus somewhat fallen in the social scale, Piergentile sent his wife out as the servant of a noble lady, Donna Diana de' Venti. One of his sisters earned her bread as a laundress. The only member of his family who did not suffer by the reverses of fortune which visited them was his brother Frà Salvador, of the order of the conventual minors, who lived at the monastery of Montalto. Though reduced to poverty, not to beggary, and henceforth part of the common people, the Peretti were not altogether fallen. They had preserved, with the memory of a better past, some connexion with kinsfolk in good circumstances, and shared in a measure the consideration with which Frà Salvador was looked upon, owing to his reputation of a good priest, and to the influence which he exercised as a monk; for monastic orders, which are essentially democratic institutions, constitute in Catholic countries, where the fault of destroying them has not been committed, the moral link which exists between the masses and the higher ranks of society, soften the character of their relation to each other, and give the children of the poor the opportunity of rising without obliging anyone to go down in the social scale. Occupied as Piergentile was in planting and nursing his orange trees, he, however, entertained a singular ambition. He believed himself destined to be the father of a Pope. Infallible signs, he said, made him certain of the fact, and having on one occasion dreamt that the first child his wife would conceive would be a Pope, he no longer doubted the high destiny of the little boy that came into the world on the feast of St. Lucia, on Friday, December 13, 1521, at 16 hours. He called him Felice, wishing thereby to note the good fortune which was to greet his son. In the family it was an accepted belief that the young boy was to be a Pope, and when his young sister asked a baiocco of the passer-by, which custom in Italy does not necessarily indicate beggary, she never failed to add, 'Felice will give it you back.'¹

That the future Pope did drive pigs² is not in the least impossible. It was so rumoured in Rome at the time of his advent. Pigs, those useful and domestic animals, enjoy great favour in southern countries—are much cared for by people in easy circumstances; and if Piergentile was fortunate enough to possess a few, and entrusted their care to his children, he only imitated his neighbours in this respect; but this does not prove that young Peretti was a shepherd, as Leti and others have said, thus placing his family, against all truth, in the last ranks of the people.

When nine years of age, Felice entered the convent of Montalto; at twelve became a novice, astonished the monks by his vivacity, his application, and his facility in learning; made rapid progress, and having continued his studies in various monasteries, became, when scarcely nineteen, a celebrated preacher. During several years the convents of his order, first in the small, then in the large towns of the Peninsula, all sought the honour and advantage of having Frà Felice to preach during Advent or Lent, or on feast-days,

¹ Priuli, 1586. In giving these details, which Tempesti, probably wittingly, ignores, Priuli adds that they were communicated to him before the election of Sixtus V. by a compatriot of the latter, 'whose word may be believed.'

² Pasquier heard it said by Pisany, 'that he began by driving pigs, and that, as he was doing so, such a storm came on that two Cordeliers, who were fording a river much swollen by the rain, were obliged to have recourse to the boy, who took them over one by one on his shoulders'—a child of nine carrying monks on his shoulders!

so certain were they of the prodigious effect which his ever-flowing eloquence, his numerous and energetic quotations, which suited the times, would produce on the people. Never stopped by worldly considerations, he attacked men and things, even the mightiest, if he thought they failed in their duty. Thus it was that, preaching on one occasion in Rome, upon the text, 'Astiterunt reges terræ,' he spoke strongly against Charles V., Ferdinand I., and Henry II. There were many cardinals and some ambassadors among his audience. Those of Spain and of France complained to Julius III.; and the cardinal-protector of the Franciscans, who was attached to Frà Felice, had great difficulty in getting him out of the scrape. It was during the Lent of 1552 that for the first time his powerful voice was heard in the ecclesiastical world. He was preaching in the Church of the Apostles, before a crowded audience. Together with the Court theologians might be seen all the most distinguished members of the religious orders, rather curious than good-natured listeners, who were already jealous of his incipient reputation. Young noblemen and ladies of the highest Roman circles came, as much for fashion's sake as for piety. Cardinal Carpi was there, whose conquest Frà Felice had made some years before; Cardinal Ghislieri also (Pius V.), Ignatius Loyola, Philip Neri, who, though not yet encircled with the official glory, were already canonised in the mind of the public. Struck by the ardent spirit which moved him and was visible in his speech, in his manner, in the young monk's looks, in the exuberance of his diction, the solid science of which he was possessed, the purity of the religion that distinguished him, the spirit of the reaction which moved him, they recognised in him the man that belonged to them by right, and promised to take him in hand, to make him, what they succeeded in doing, one of the great reformers. Hence dates his fortune. From that time Frà Felice lived in the intimacy of men of the highest rank, not in that of Julius III., who was not a zealot, but among those who represented the new Catholic opinion at the Vatican, where that opinion was soon to make its way. There was Cardinal Caraffa, who two years later was to be Pope Pius IV., Cardinal Ghislieri, the future Pope Pius V., Cardinal Carpi, one of the most eminent members of the Sacred College, the friend of Bembo, Sadolet, St. Ignatius, and Paolo Planuzio. These cardinals, to the great astonishment of the monks and inhabitants of the Piazza of the Apostles, were seen to get down from their carriages at the gates of the convent, penetrate into the cell of the young frate, and shut themselves up with him for several hours. Ignatius Loyola, Philip Neri, Bozio, literary celebrities, saintly men belonging to other orders, came to see him, sang his praises about, and paved for him the way to the papacy, while they predicted to him that he would become Pope. Even in a purely worldly sense his stays in Rome, which were always limited though often repeated, were not lost for his advancement. He made the acquaintance of young Colonna, called on him in his palace of the same name, which joined the convent, gave him lessons, and thus laid the foundation of the relations with that family to which some day that of the poor monk was to be allied.

Frà Felice had the faults which flowed from his qualities. He was loyal but rough, quick but easily carried away by anger,¹ strict with himself, not over indulgent towards others, and sober; he slept little, worked incessantly, was zealous but often wanting in discretion and judgment, humble in estimating himself, proud when he compared himself to others, but happily clear-sighted, and always the monk in the full acceptance of the word. He despised this world's riches as long as he had not any, and was contented with the poverty of a monk, which, after all, is the most solid wealth going, since it secures independence. He was generous, but naturally parsimonious. Well regulated in all his private affairs, he took care of those of his family, whom he loved tenderly, and whom, though, in his vagrant and well-occupied existence, he saw little of, he never forgot. His greatest treasures were the few books he had been allowed by his Superior to purchase, and the names of which he used to inscribe in his journal.² Therein also he used to note his expenses, the common incidents of his life as a monk, which contrasted so strongly with the influence which he already exercised by his preaching, the reputation he had acquired, the connexions he had made, the high destinies which were dawning upon him.

¹ 'La collera è in lui tanto gagliarda, che alcune volte gli tremano le mani quando è preso da ella.' Priuli, 1586. He advised his nephew, Cardinal Montalto, to be patient, saying as an excuse for himself, 'Le nature risentite e libere sono piene d'amore e di gratitudine.'

² This MS. is entirely in his own handwriting, and is still in the possession of Prince Chigi. Tempesti and Ranke have made use of it.

After finishing his theological course at Ferrara, occupying a lecturer's chair at Rimini, receiving the order of priesthood at the age of twenty-six at Sienna, and the degree of doctor at Fermo, he attracted the attention of Cardinal Carpi, who took him under his protection, and employed him as regent of all the convents of his order, first at Sienna, then at Naples, afterwards at Venice. When he came to Venice, in 1556, he was in his thirty-sixth year, and had already then made a name for himself throughout the Peninsula as a noted preacher. Some of his sermons which he had printed were read with avidity.¹ As a rector his special mission was to reform the convents, to introduce into them a strict observance of the rules, and therefore to fight against the useless or the lukewarm. This difficult and at times painful task he fulfilled with indefatigable energy. His stern purpose, which coincided so well with his own convictions, met with the approval of his protectors in Rome ; but gained for him, together with several enmities, the reputation of being cruel. He made the mistake of willingly assuming the character, thinking to influence by fear—a bad means, however, of attracting souls and converting them. His duties as a rector, which everywhere were of a delicate character, must have been doubly so in Venice, in the great convent of the Frari, where the party opposed to the reactionary Catholic movement could depend, if not upon the support of the Government, at least upon its sympathetic tolerance. As soon as the new rector had arrived, he encountered everywhere a secret opposition, which resulted in his leaving of his own accord, fatigued and despairing of ever obtaining any success. The accusations of which he had been the object having been proved to be false, he was restored to his post, not only as Rector of the Frari, but as Adviser of the Holy See. He was generous enough—and the fact was noted in Rome—to propose on this occasion that his principal antagonist should be appointed Superior of the Order of the Frari, believing him to have returned to better feelings, and little knowing the ingratitude his generosity would meet with. The extended privileges with which he was invested by the new Pope, Pius IV., as an Inquisitor, and the severity with which he exercised these functions, which were particularly odious to the Venetians, caused the Republic to ask for and obtain his recall. Such a circumstance, which for the second time called for diplomatic intervention as regards him, would at other times have done him harm ; but in those days of struggle, where the Church militant fought for its existence, his faults, if faults they were, only endeared him to his powerful friends.

He returned to Rome a greater man, owing to the persecutions to which he had been subjected, was appointed theologian to the Council which was about to assemble at Trent, but to which he did not proceed, Adviser to the Holy See,¹ and lecturer at the Sapienza. He continued for several years in Rome—as General Procurator and Apostolic Vicar of his order—the struggle he had begun with the ignorant, the lukewarm, the unwilling, and again surprised the Holy City by a generous forgetfulness of past injuries. The same monk who was his bitterest enemy, and who had been the cause of his recall from Venice, was found guilty of various crimes, and was summoned to Rome to be punished accordingly. Thanks to the intervention of his victim, he was pardoned by the Pope. The Christian heroism of Frà Felice was much praised, and henceforth Cardinal Ghislieri, who had long been his protector, showed him signal marks of his friendship. At that time Pope Pius IV., before deciding finally against the Archbishop of Toledo, who had been condemned for heresy by the Spanish Inquisition, resolved to send a legate to the spot. Cardinal Buoncompagni, with a brilliant embassy, which besides himself counted three future Popes in its number, Monsignor Castagna, Monsignor Aldobrandini, and Frà Felice as theologian, went to Spain some months before the death of the Pope. From this time dates the long misunderstanding which, during the whole of Buoncompagni's pontificate, was to bear so painfully upon the existence of Cardinal Montalto, and make him, even when afterwards he had become Pope, unjust towards the memory of Gregory XIII. This enmity appears to have been excited by some unkind proceedings on the part of the legate, which made some noise at the time, and of which traces are to be found in the envoy's correspondence of the period. In a MS. in the library of Prince Altieri, entitled, 'Sixtus V., pontifex maximus,' it is said that, whenever there was any difficulty in finding a sufficient number of horses, Buoncompagni was wont to make the frate mount the beasts of burden, and follow with the baggage in the company of muleteers. Strictly speaking, it was the monk's place, since, of course, he must walk after a prelate; but it was not Frà Felice's place. The latter, who could with greater ease forgive big offences than little ones, conceived towards Buoncompagni, who had nothing in common with his ardent nature, a profound and invincible aversion.

The death of Pius IV. put an end to the Legate's mission. This time Peretti had the good luck to travel alone, and still greater good fortune in finding on his return Cardinal Ghislieri upon the Papal throne. The new Pope at once appointed him to the Bishopric of St. Agatha, which he afterwards exchanged for that of Fermo, and four years later made him a cardinal, among the third batch of cardinals he had made since his accession, besides giving him the pension of 100 scudi a month, which is known as the 'poor cardinal's dish.' He likewise generously defrayed the expenses of his first installation.¹ The new cardinal held his receptions in a house belonging to the Bianchi, known as the 'Puppazzi,' on account of the grotesque statues which studded the front of the house, and which the proprietor had placed at his disposal on that occasion.²

As soon as he had been promoted to the important dignity of Vicar-General of his order, he had sent for his sister Camilla, whom he loved dearly and compared to St. Monica, declaring when he was Pope that to her he owed his having honourably gone through the many long years of his poverty, and that to her prayers he was indebted for his exaltation. Though very devout, Donna Camilla, who was very like her brother in face,¹ had a thorough acquaintance with the things of this world;² she directed the cardinal's house,³ and was all her life the temporal providence of her family. The widow of a farmer, she was the mother of Francesco and Maria Mignucci, who, thanks to their uncle's position, married much above their station. A much higher destiny awaited the children of Maria, who had married a Roman gentleman of the name of Fabio Damasceni.⁴ Her children were to be, the one Cardinal Alexander Montalto, the other Michel Peretti, Prince of Venafro, a third Flavia Orsini, Duchess of Bracciano, daughter-in-law of Paolo Giordano Orsini, with whom the reader will soon become acquainted, and the fourth, Ursula, wife of the Great Constable, Marco Antonio Colonna. These four grand-nephews of the Pope, whom he obliged to take the name of Peretti, as his nephews, were born while he was a cardinal, were brought to Rome, received in his house, and brought up under his supervision. At this time he lived in a small and mean-looking house in the Parione quarter, and in the Via Papale. His sister, his nephew Francesco and his young wife, Fabio and Maria, together with their four children, all lived with him. The simplicity of the household and the poverty of the furniture struck the Venetian envoy when, at the close of the Conclave, he hastened to congratulate Donna Camilla, and found her in an almost unfurnished and very common room. Little Alexander wore clothes which were more than threadbare; but Priuli was right when he supposed that the child would soon exchange such tatters for purple robes.¹ The cardinal's fortune was small; it was composed of the revenues of his bishopric, which, by the economy and management of his sister, were made to suffice for their wants. These were valued at 8,000 scudi,² which was enough to live upon with ease, but Montalto spent most of it in buildings which he had begun at Sta. Maria Maggiore, and later on a vineyard which was situated close to that church.

³ Various authors say that the cardinal lived in the Via Lautari. The archivio notarile of the Apostolic Chamber contains a document concerning the sale of the house, now numbered 68, 69, and 70, in the Via Papale, Rione Parione, at the corner of a little lane, and looking on to the old Bischi Palace. The deed of sale is dated February 11, 1574, and shows that the buyer, Andrea Rubini, purchased it 'pro persona nominanda,' for 2,050 scudi. Another document, dated April 2 of the same year, declares the purchaser to have been Cardinal Felice Peretti, and many circumstances would prove that he lived there between the years 1574 and 1581, when he retired to his vineyard near Sta. Maria Maggiore.

Honoured with the confidence of Pius V., consulted upon every matter of importance in ecclesiastical affairs, active as an Inquisitor, he divided his time between his pastoral duties and the works which kept him in Rome during the greater portion of that pontificate. Feeling that his end was near, Pius V. called him to his bedside, and Montalto was enabled to assist at one of the most touching and grandest spectacles, the death of a saint.

The best days of his cardinalship ended with the life of Pius V. Buoncompagni, on becoming Gregory XIII., was weak enough to remember his quarrel with his former attaché, and the wrongs with which he had reproached him. He treated him with haughtiness, excluded him from all participation in public affairs,¹ and on one occasion, as he came out of Sta. Maria Maggiore, he took away his pension, on the plea 'that poor cardinals were not to build palaces.'

Meanwhile the cardinal accepted the position which was made to him, of a man out of favour, and lived a more and more retired life, never appearing in public except when necessary, at consistories or church solemnities.

He held little intercourse with his colleagues, by whom he was rather considered than liked, and, in fact, he knew how to bear up against misfortune. Incapable however of holding his tongue, a fluent and sarcastic speaker, he often gave way to a criticism of the Pope, of his government, of his favourites, and revenged himself by sarcasms—a course exceedingly imprudent (clever men are often imprudent) if he really aimed at being Pope some day. He should have foreseen that the Gregorians, the most numerous faction in the Sacred College, would infallibly exclude him. But a thousand circumstances prove that at that time he was feeling the effects of his disgrace, as well as of the forced inactivity to which he was reduced, and which was so much against his nature, and that he had given up any ambitious hopes, or rather those of his family, for, besides a few idle words when he still lived at his father's house as a child, nothing shows that he ever seriously entertained them. His only thought, therefore, was to procure occupation and such recreations as were worthy of his elevated mind, his refined taste in art, his fallen position, as a poor and disgraced cardinal, who was not the less a prince of the Church, and if not so considered at Court, at least regarded by an appreciative, if not sympathising, public as one of the most eminent men in the Sacred College.

He had three hobbies—books, the arts, and building. For many years he had devoted his leisure hours to a scientific task—the revision of the works of the Fathers of the Church. When he became a cardinal, the first use he made of the liberality of his kind protector Pius V., was to erect a sepulchral monument to the memory of Nicholas IV., of the Franciscan Order, to which he himself belonged, in the tribune of Sta. Maria Maggiore. At the same time he added the chapel of the cradle (1576) to that basilica which was enlarged and finished during his pontificate, and received the bodies of the two friends, Pius V. and Sixtus V. He finally bought a vineyard, there to build a country house. On this occasion, as he was always wont to do when he purchased any small estate, in order to avoid the unfortunate vigilance of the Court, he employed a false name. Obligated to be economical of his means, which were from time to time increased by sundry gifts from the Grand-Duke of Tuscany,¹ he had recourse to a mason who had just arrived from his native mountains of Como, and who showed great intelligence and was devoted to him. This young man, in peasant wise, used to send the money he economised to his parents, who hid it about their cottage. When the cardinal, owing to his being deprived of his pension, was no longer able to build, young Domenico Fontana continued the works with the capital he had economised, partly out of gratitude to his benefactor, partly also in the hope that the cardinal would some day be no less grateful to him when the wheel of fortune should have turned, as is possible everywhere, and nowhere so likely as in Rome. The works were not, therefore, altogether interrupted, and, four years before his exaltation, Cardinal Peretti had the pleasure of inhabiting his vineyard, declaring and perhaps believing at times—for the unoccupied who still feel some strength within them never wholly give up the hope of turning it to account some day—that he would end his days in it.

That Villa Peretti, now the Villa Massimi, built upon the declivity of the Esquiline, stands on classical ground. The ramparts of the royal Rome of Servius Tullius passed over it. Under Augustus it formed part of the garden of Mæcenæ. Diocletian had comprised it within the vast circle of his Thermæ.

When Montalto became Pope, he bought a few fields to enlarge his property, caused the magnificent ruins which stood on it to be removed (for he had little regard for pagan remains, especially when they were in his way), and erected there his ponderous palace called the Termini. A traveller alighting from the railway can see it. It does not contrast favourably with the Palazzetto. Fontana, as it often happens, receded while moving with his century.

As a cardinal, Montalto was satisfied with a little house, the Palazzetto we have mentioned, a real treasure, and the model of a small country house. The last days of the great epoch ennoble and establish that first and finest work of Domenico Fontana. It also calls attention by the frescoes which adorn the apartments, and which were painted by the artists then most in vogue, Mattia of Sienna, Cesare Nebbia, Salimbene, Paolo Brill, Baglioni, and others, who are often taken for the Zuccari, to whom their works are frequently attributed. It has justly been noticed that there is an undoubted superiority in the pictures painted for Cardinal Montalto, for whom time was of no importance, over those ordered by Sixtus the Fifth, whose feverish activity he communicated to others, and who, foreseeing death,¹ wished to replace time by the extent of his will, and called upon hours to give him what years seldom grant to ordinary mortals.

Whoever has visited these spots has felt the charm of that dwelling, which preserves its noble appearance notwithstanding the damage done to its frescoes by the influence of centuries, and the disappearance of those splendid avenues of trees to make room for the improvements which modern art has conceived it necessary to make in that portion of Rome. The hermit of the Villa Peretti had planted them with his own hand, in company with a few faithful friends in misfortune, the celebrated Scipio Tolomei, Castrucci, and others, while all along he was conceiving vast projects, which then in his mind were mere freaks of fancy and dreams impossible to realize. Around his vineyard stood the vaults and massive pillars of the Thermæ; before his window the old Basilica, which had not yet been hid by its modern screen; and from his loggia, which has likewise disappeared, as has the greatest portion of the Thermæ, and the old front of Sta. Maria Maggiore, he could at one glance see the whole of Rome, a portion of the Campagna, and the Sabine Mountains.¹

He was about to leave the house in the Via Papale to go and inhabit his villa, when a cruel event occurred which caused great sensation, and deeply affected him. His nephew Francesco, having been called out into the street one evening by his brother-in-law Marcello Accoramboni, was found dead on the following morning. He had been assassinated, and his body, pierced by bullets and cut by swords, lay on the stones of the street which leads to the Quirinal, close to the garden of the Sforza, now the Barberini Palace. This unfortunate man left a young wife, who was one of the celebrated beauties of the day.

Who has not heard of her classic features, her cultivated mind, her quick wit, her eloquence, the melodious tones of her voice, her simple ways, her graceful and taking manners, the irresistible charm, in fact, produced by all these qualities, which singly are sufficient to attract, but when combined fascinate and subjugate, and throw upon their fortunate possessors the supernatural lights of heaven, while they fill us at the same time with admiration, with fear, and sinister forebodings? Too much perfection, like too great happiness, is prone to give rise to secret misgivings. No one is ignorant of the events of her short life: of the adventures, the frailty, the repentance, the expiation, and tragical end of the too lovely Vittoria Accoramboni. At Gubbio, that classical town of Umbria, the palace of the Accoramboni can still be seen in the high street of the upper town. It is a fine building of the time of the first Renaissance, and is now falling into decay. The owner of the palace, the father of Vittoria, had married a Roman lady, Tarquinia Paluzzi, of the family of the Albertoni, who was well connected, proud, and discontented at having only married a country gentleman, ambitious, intriguing, and anxious that her daughter should shine in the world. Suitors were not wanting. Some were in earnest; others had intentions which, though not likely to alarm the mother, who depended upon her knowledge of the world and the charms of her daughter for success, were suspected by the father, who did not see with pleasure, nor even without fear, the frequent visits paid to his daughter by one of the most important noblemen of Rome and Italy, Paolo Giordano Orsini, Duke of Bracciano, who was prepared to give¹ Vittoria his name and his fortune. He had married first the unfortunate Isabella of Tuscany, whose sudden death brought him into some suspicion. He was publicly accused of having strangled her with his own hands in a fit of jealousy. But, strange to say, he nevertheless continued to live in good understanding with his brothers-in-law, the Grand-Duke Francis and Cardinal de' Medici. His intimate relations with the latter were even a cause of his great influence in Rome, of which fact the cardinal knew likewise how to profit. At the Court of Spain he enjoyed great favour, owing to his known devotion to the Spanish crown.¹ He liked to speak of his intimacy with Philip II., whose friendship greatly added to his prestige. At the request of Cardinal Granvella, Philip was about to confer upon him the Order of the Golden Fleece, when the news of his death reached Madrid. He possessed in Rome the Monte Giordano, now Gabrielli Palace, the palace of Campo de' Fiori (Pio), and that of the Piazza Navone called the Pasquino, which was pulled down in the last century, the site being now occupied by the Braschi Palace. With him were many other Orsini—Latino, known as a soldier, others more or less mixed up in the Duke's affairs, more or less at war with the Government, some even prosecuted and openly in league with the banditti. Among these Ludovico Orsini, though a miscreant, was possessed of great qualities. His brother Raimondo had lost his life in one of those quarrels with the sbirri which were so frequent under Gregory's pontificate. To avenge him Ludovico had caused the assassination of Vincenzo Vitelli, Giacomo's lieutenant-general. The unfortunate victim was coming out of a card party at Giacomo's, when a shot killed him inside his own carriage. Ludovico at once took to flight, became for several years a bandit, then entered the service of the Republic of Venice, by way of resuming his former character. Venice was always kind to the Orsini, and appointed him military commandant of Corfu. At this time of his life, which was to meet with a tragic end, we come across him. Paolo Giordano, though suspected of an atrocious crime, paraded about Rome with haughtiness, gave hospitality to the banditti, as well in Rome as in his numerous country houses, and especially at Bracciano, enjoying all the impunity which in the weak reign of Gregory XIII. was granted to men of his stamp, especially when they bore a great name and had powerful relations. He had personally none of the advantages which captivate a woman. He was close upon 50 years of age; his features were not agreeable. His extraordinary stoutness amounted to a repulsive infirmity. He, however, did not displease the youthful Vittoria, with whom he appeared to be more and more in love. The mother thought she had obtained her wish, when Accoramboni, to cut short the attentions, dangerous in many respects, of the head of the house of Orsini, married his daughter to young Peretti, the cardinal's nephew. This marriage, which was a poor one in comparison with the connexion sought after, was, however a good one, considering the uncle's high position, the difficulties of the case, and especially there being no other means of getting out of them. The marriage was performed on June 21, 1573, in the Church of Santa Maria della Corte, the parish church of the head of the Albertoni, and the newly-married bride came to live with her husband in Cardinal Montalto's house. She was received as a queen, conquered everybody's affection, and especially pleased the cardinal, who to the end of his life ever preserved a great liking for her. Endeavouring to reconcile her with her new mode of life, surrounding her with a little luxury, a little comfort, he tried to make her modest home agreeable to her, and not to contrast too strongly with the habits, antecedents, and rather brilliant than solid qualities of the young patrician. Her husband, who was very inferior to her, and who at first was desperately enamoured of her, had nothing to offer her in return for so many qualities but a love which ought to have sufficed her. But unfortunately love is not always enough. It could not make the beautiful and elegant Vittoria forget the prospect, now gone, of the grandeurs she had dreamt of. Her mother especially could not reconcile herself to the marriage, but kept up amicable relations with Bracciano, and while she probably prevented her daughter from becoming reconciled to her fate, she fostered in her mind thoughts which, if not criminal, were at least insane.

What was the young woman's conduct? Unhappily, it was not irreproachable. She led her husband into expenses, and soon spent her marriage portion. She was surrounded by lovers,¹ and showed herself jealous of her sister-in-law, Maria Damasceni, who was preferred in the family on account of her virtues, and who was to succumb a few years later to decline. Her death was attributed to the witchcraft of a maid-servant of Vittoria, who was likewise accused of having bewitched Paolo Giordano, as if the charms of Francesco's wife had not been enough to place him at her feet.¹

At the outset of his married life Peretti believed himself to be the happiest of men, but his joy and illusions were soon dispelled. His wife soon took a dislike to him, and the people who came to the house perceived the dissension which reigned in the household. Donna Camilla could not accustom herself to the mode of life of the young couple, to the splendid toilets of Vittoria, to her expensive and worldly tastes, which no doubt were in accordance with her former education, but were out of place in a house modest even to monastic simplicity. She was afraid of her step-daughter, and foresaw some catastrophe. The night when her son, at the call of Marcello Accoramboni, was about to leave the house to meet with the death which his brother-in-law was to inflict on him, she threw herself at his feet, implored of him to remain, and predicted some misfortune. She guessed that a crime was preparing, and from whom the blow would come. The news of the assassination of Francesco horrified both the town and the Court. Not that such events were of rare occurrence (people were but too accustomed to them), but everyone felt that the Duke had had a hand in the affair. People trembled at the thought that the Government, impelled perhaps by the cardinal, would this time issue from its accustomed lethargy, and try to punish the assassin. As no one doubted that the assassin was Duke Bracciano, the head of the Orsini, it was feared that there would be much bloodshed in Rome. Nothing happened, however. While the public shuddered at the crime, the victim's uncle alone was unnerved. A consistory was held on the following day. Montalto went to it as usual, and, admired for it by many, accused of affectation by others, he merely replied by settled speeches to the condolence of his colleagues. But when the consistory was over, he went up to the Pope, and gave way to his grief.¹ Without accusing, and even, pro formâ, going so far as to ask the Pope to do nothing, he was in hopes that Gregory XIII. would order a severe inquest. The Holy Father showed how indignant he was at the idea of so horrible a crime. An inquest was held, but, apparently anxious not to bring down upon himself the vengeance of the powerful Duke,¹ the Pope later placed in his hands the documents relative to the inquest, which were afterwards deposited in Fort St. Angelo, and delivered up to Duke Sora. Francesco Peretti's servant had been arrested as an accomplice.

Matters went no further. Some days after, in order to throw a veil over the real culprits, a certain chevalier Pallentieri, a man of questionable reputation, and who had been exiled for several crimes, was made to write a letter in which it was stated that he, Pallentieri, had killed Francesco in order to prevent a murder which on this occasion became a further cause of resentment between them. Gregory cannot have said, 'È veramente un gran frate,' and the facts must have occurred very differently from the representation given of them by every writer, and on the authority of anonymous manuscripts. This is also proved by the subsequent conduct of Sixtus V., who requested the extradition from Venice of Marcello Accoramboni, and had him judged and executed. I have entered into these apparently secondary details because they show not only the character of Sixtus V., but also his position under Gregory XIII. Everything was denied him, even to the punishment of the assassin of the principal member of his family. He declared then that he forgave, but what could he do more than make a virtue of necessity? He would likewise have preferred to see Marcello die on a Venetian scaffold, for one of the numerous crimes which that miscreant had committed, than for the assassination of his nephew, and after the judgment pronounced by the Roman Courts; but it was only when Venice had refused to revise the trial of Marcello for the murder committed at Padua that he had him tried for the death of his nephew. Such a conduct, which is wanting in frankness, is only to be explained by the Pope's character, which was just, strict even unto cruelty, but hating revenge, and rancorous only in small things.

¹ A MS. of the period, at the Vatican, gives the names of the men paid by a nobleman 'whose name, for certain reasons, we do not mention,'—so great was the terror he inspired.

the latter was supposed to have contemplated on the person of Pallentieri himself. Such a fable deceived nobody. The inoffensive character of Francesco, whose only enemy was his wife's beauty, the tone of the letter—everything proved it to be false. The Pope, however, believed in it. He ordered the supposed murderer to be arrested, a superfluous measure, since Pallentieri was not in Rome, but in perfect safety. Public opinion had not, for one moment, hesitated in pointing to the true culprits. They were, it was whispered, Duke Bracciano and Donna Tarquinia, the mother of Vittoria. While the cardinal, deeply affected by such a misfortune, and deeply mortified to see that even justice was denied him, was doubly attentive to the young widow, consoled the unfortunate mother, and replied to the condolences of his absent friends, a fresh sorrow, even greater than all the rest, since it affected the honour of the family, increased the measure of grief with which they were visited. Some days after the crime had been committed, Vittoria disappeared from the house of the cardinal. She was soon found to be in the house of Duke Bracciano. This news, which fired the Peretti family with indignation and filled them with shame, frightened the Orsini, and especially Cardinal de' Medici, who was, above all, anxious to prevent a marriage. Gregory was made to give¹ a monitory prohibiting Vittoria from marrying without his previous consent, and declaring the marriage to be null and void in the event of its taking place notwithstanding. The Duke, alarmed at this, hid his mistress in his garden of Magnanapoli. A few days later another monitory from the Pope prescribed Vittoria's return to her father's home, never to leave it, even to hear mass, and to break with Orsini altogether. She returned to her father's house. Other monitories were promulgated. They were each attended to, but for a short time only, and the young woman went alternately over from the Massa Palace, which belonged to her parents, close to St. Louis of the French, to the Duke's garden and back to her house. Towards the end of the year, the sbirri entered the Accoramboni Palace, carried away Vittoria, and took her to the monastery of St. Cecilia at the Trastevere. She was later shut up in Fort St. Angelo, where she remained for nearly a year. Paolo Giordano, however, stood well at Court, and contrived to obtain the setting aside of each monitory¹ excepting one,—that which commanded Vittoria not to marry without the Pope's permission. The Duke had made believe that he had given up all idea of marrying her.² The members of his family, the Grand-Duke of Tuscany, Cardinal de' Medici breathed more freely. They were not aware that the marriage had been twice solemnised at Rome and at Bracciano, where Vittoria lived with her husband in no fear of being molested by further monitories. This marriage gave rise in the following year to a lawsuit, which did not prevent the two coming to Rome and living together as husband and wife at the Orsini Palace.³ Finally, dreading fresh severities on the part of the Pope, and giving way to Cardinal de' Medici's entreaties, Paolo Giordano solemnly promised, a few days before the Pope's death, to separate from his wife. This promise was followed by a third marriage, celebrated on the 24th of April, at the very time of the election of Sixtus V.¹

Thus, with the exception of the two last years of the reign of Pius V., Montalto's cardinalship was passed in worries and a forced retreat. Petty persecutions, more difficult to endure than great reverses of fortune, poisoned for many years the life of the future Pope. They must be borne, however, and if not silently—which was more than his strength could stand—at least with that resignation which, while it helps to bear up with the present evil, contrives to maintain the hope of a happier future. Cardinal Montalto was a martyr before becoming a hero. He, the former Inquisitor, one of the principal actors, though one little before the public in the great religious movement of the day, which had monopolised his thoughts and still filled his soul, now devoted his time to literary studies, to watching workmen, or planting trees. Ideas of religious reform seemed to fly away from him. He was put on one side in all that related to public business, owing to the sovereign's dislike to petty rivalries and his own failings. They were faults of character the most difficult to avoid, and the bitterest to expiate, since they become apparent and produce a remorse only when it is too late to repair the evil to which they give rise. His position was likewise due to those circumstances against which the will of man is impotent when the man is weak, but not otherwise insurmountable when met by such qualities as those which Montalto possessed,—belief in his convictions, clearness of judgment, and the lightness of a well-fortified soul. He, no doubt, had times when he was deeply discouraged. Who has not been discouraged at times of great trial? There were days and weeks when he believed he had reached his journey's end in life; but these moments of dejection were soon over. His indomitable character, so correctly appreciated by some sagacious observers, always finished by carrying the day.¹ At the moment when he saw the Sacred College at his feet, proclaiming him Pope, he recovered those virtues, which were hidden, but not gone, as his pontificate shows, during that long and painful period of disgrace. Those famous crutches of which so much has been said, and which have become an article of faith,—which he is said to have thrown away at the time of his exaltation, according to a legend rather symbolical than untrue, and which, as often is the case in legends, discovers the truth under the mask with which it is covered by the imagination of the people—these crutches were nothing but the chains of his forced prolonged inaction during the thirteen years of Gregory's pontificate; and at last they were broken.

What a change in his speech, in his manner! What a contrast between Montalto and Sixtus V.! Both Court and town marvelled at it. The astonishment of the public, which seldom looks at the bottom of things, but is contented with their outward appearance, became a myth with time, and, as such, became history, greatly to the detriment of Sixtus V., and, what is worse, to that of truth.¹ Montalto has been shown up as a hypocrite, a comedian who deceived the world, which, for ridiculous reasons, was supposed to be very credulous. Nothing can be more false. It was as if the captive eagle had suddenly left his cage, and, spreading his wings, had flown into space. The change in his person, which was spoken of, does not appear to have struck his electors, who were surprised, however, not to see him changed, but to have been themselves the authors of the change. How, and by what means, had the son of the gardener of Grottamare travelled all the distance which separated his birthplace and the Vatican? There are various ways of making a career. Some succeed by audacious, others by commonplace means. Ever pushing, they swallow the mortifications they meet without wincing, and find a door whereat to enter should they be shown out of another. They impose themselves upon people, and find a help in the very tediousness they produce, in the habit which people take to of seeing them always and everywhere, in the silent contempt of the honest as well as in the loud applause of the mob. But they almost always end badly, for the catastrophe comes sooner or later. Public opinion, so easily blinded, so hard to undeceive, but so prompt in its revenge when enlightened, seldom fails to exact a cruel or disgraceful atonement from those who have received its favours unworthily.

Others appear who are confident in their own merit. They proceed slowly but surely, and ever leave upon all that pleasing impression which intelligence, courage, and perseverance must produce. They attract attention and maintain it; they command the respect even of the ill-natured, and carry off by force the prizes which intrigue and hypocrisy would fain contend for. They receive quietly the applause of the people, do not falter if they fall out of favour, march from one success to another, or succumb honourably if not gloriously, and are accompanied by the esteem of the honest, which is, after all, the only true reward of the difficulties and troubles of public life. But both, whether they be the abject followers of fortune or nobly ambitious men, require Fate to smile on them in order to succeed. One ray only suffices, but that ray must shine. Cleverly utilised, seized upon with judgment, that ray will make the man appear on the stage of the world, if only as figurante at first, but only to make him subsequently act the great parts in the great human comedy.

This advantage Frà Felice never enjoyed. During his long life as a monk, his name was never mixed up with any of the important events of the day. No historical transaction had come to put in relief that important though obscure existence, until he took possession of the throne of St. Peter. His career was most ordinary, and wonderful only because it made him rise so high. As a humble Cordelier monk, he was remarkable in his youth, like so many others, for his eloquence; as rector of several convents, as vicar of his order, he worked at reforming souls; as Inquisitor, for the preservation of faith in all its purity. The silence and shade becoming these occupations screen Frà Felice for several years from the public gaze. If at times he is noticed, it is by an excess of zeal which gives his superiors as much trouble as it does pleasure, and constitutes a bad means of succeeding in calm times. It is true that those among whom he lived were not calm. The retreat and forced idleness of his cardinalship came next. Nothing in his life strikes the imagination, or calls for the notice of his contemporaries. In the eyes of the world, 'it is a Cordelier of the name of Montalto,' as Pisany says. No single word could better show the obscure life which the monk had led up to the time of his election. But what explains his good fortune is that his convictions were deep; that from its outset he had followed the current of the religious flood which still continued to rise; that he had enlisted in the ranks of the great victorious army of the Church; that those who commanded it had to recruit their strength, and found much in that humble monk, and made him a cardinal, until his rivals made him a Pope. Frà Felice was a fortunate mortal, if we can so call those who, gifted with the highest faculties, concentrate them entirely on the attainment of one end and on one effort; fight under the command of men whom they admire and are to replace when these shall have disappeared; act—or suffer, if they cannot act—for the object they have in view, persuaded, as Montalto was, that the cause for which they labour is the first, the most important, and the only serious one of humanity.

PART THE THIRD.

CHAPTER I.

EARLY ADMINISTRATION OF SIXTUS V.

THE election over, the cardinals proceeded to St. Peter's. The Pope was carried thither in procession. The great news had spread with the rapidity of lightning, and, curiosity having the best of disappointment,² Rome, though not satisfied, hastened to contemplate that touching spectacle, and have a look at the new sovereign who had been so little observed under the preceding reign. Sixtus the Fifth¹ did not appear to be sixty-five years of age. He was of ordinary height, somewhat bent, and this made him look smaller than he really was. His head, which was comparatively large, sank rather between two broad shoulders. His forehead was high and wrinkled. Arched and tufted eyebrows shaded two small brown but brilliant eyes. A change constantly came over his expression—not over his features, which seemed to be rigid and immovable. Calmness, kindness, and tenderness; then suddenly severity, anger; then again serenity, played alternately upon his countenance. It was like the storm which threatens, which roars and bursts, but calms down at once. His complexion was swarthy, his cheeks high-coloured, his cheek-bones very prominent, a characteristic of the Slavonian race. His hair and long auburn and bushy Franciscan beard were growing grey. Soon they were to become entirely so. His health was excellent, and the slight infirmity with which he was troubled had, according to Messer Aurelio Stagni, the fashionable doctor, no serious character. His whole person struck the spectator at first, frightened him almost the next moment; but those who examined him closely were soon reassured. He was the type of a monk, with the difference that he was born to command, whereas a monk always obeys. He was attractive, though possessing no charms. He captivated, but did not please; was imposing, but not majestic; and, though he had nothing of the sovereign or of a prince in him, he could not be mistaken for anything but the master. The people understood him at once, for there are certain revelations which everyone accepts and believes in, though few can explain them.

When the procession entered the Basilica, through the great central door, the choir, under the direction of the immortal Pierluigi di Palestrina, sang the 'Ecce sacerdos magnus'; then the 'Tu es pastor ovium,' for five voices; and a mass, also for five voices; both composed in a hurry, and for the occasion, during the fourteen days of the interregnum. These compositions were below what had been expected of the great maestro. The Pope perceived it. Even at that solemn moment he could listen to the music. 'Pierluigi,' said he, 'has forgotten Pope Marcello's mass.'¹ This sarcastic criticism deeply hurt Palestrina, but has been justified by competent judges. It was the first word uttered by the new Pope—just, severe, and merciless, as his pontificate was to be.

A 'Te Deum' ended the solemnity, and Sixtus V. retired to the apartments of Gregory XIII. There the cardinals, the noblemen, prelates, and courtiers filled the 'stanze.' The young Japanese princes were also there. Brought by the Jesuits from the other end of the world, they had been the delight of Gregory XIII., and were the living spectacle of the conquest of those countries by the Christian faith.

The French ambassador, desirous to congratulate the new Pope before his Spanish colleague, had the greatest difficulty in approaching him. It was only through Cardinal de Sens, who consented to 'shoulder'² him, that he was able to make way and get into the closet of the Pope. The Holy Father was at dinner, and talking with Cardinal Altemps, who, standing before him, was 'negotiating' an audience for Count Olivarès. After dinner M. de Pisany was allowed to kiss the Pope's foot, and the latter, looking at him 'with a beaming countenance,' said that Cardinal d'Este had made him Pope. Pisany was therefore convinced that he would have to deal with a most tractable pontiff as regards the affairs of the Very Christian King. Cardinal d'Este shared these illusions.¹ He wrote to Henry III. that, contrary to the truth, he had told the Holy Father that 'it was by order of his sovereign that he had helped in the election, which the Pope believed to be the case and accepted as such.' Count Olivarès and Cardinal Madruccio were not at all inclined to share the same feeling of security. The latter, in announcing to Philip II. the exaltation of Montalto,² who he says is very devoted to Spain, tries to excuse his choice, which is an excellent one, according to him, by the exigencies of the times, and the impossibility of centring the votes upon another member of the Sacred College. Sixtus himself tried to gain Olivarès, spoke to him of his friendship for Philip II., addressed some vague but gracious words to him, as he was wont to do to all the members of the diplomatic body. Priuli, the Venetian envoy, who was less confident than the representatives of France, less suspicious than those of Spain, and more in the right than the others, was of opinion that it was impossible as yet to judge of the future policy of a sovereign who was amiable in speech, grateful in expression, but already showed that his rule would be a stern one. Personally he could but express himself satisfied. Like M. de Pisany, he had come to the palace in all haste. Led by the Cardinal of Verona, he had preceded the crowd and reached the Pope, who was surrounded by cardinals, each asking a favour, but who finally drew aside, so as to allow the envoy to kiss the foot of His Holiness. A few commonplace words were exchanged, because the cardinals, with their hats in their hands, did not choose to withdraw. Two days after, he again found a number of cardinals with His Holiness, who, however, came up to him, and, calling him into a private room, requested him, contrary to etiquette, which he was not yet acquainted with, to cover himself. 'Please to inform your Government that we like Venice well, and intend to live in good harmony with her, that we continue to be desirous of favouring and helping her; but that we are sorry to see her States surrounded by heretics and Turks; and this is not said out of form or ceremony, but because it is the truth.' He repeated these words with emphasis, looking with a resolute air at Priuli. He then recommended the Venetian Government to respect the office of the Holy Inquisition and of the bishops, who were too often inconvenienced by being called and detained in Venice. 'I do not say,' he added, 'that respect must be shown to the bishops who rebel; because then we would not object to their being imprisoned, and even to their having their heads cut off.' These last words were said with an agreeable smile, so at least the ambassador wrote.¹

Abroad the news of the election of Sixtus the Fifth was variously received, and with displeasure by Philip.²

² Antonio Tornimbene to the Doge. Barcelona, May 16, 1585.

While sincerely desirous this time to let the Conclave freely elect the Pope, he had inclined in favour of San Giorgio, not of Farnese, as the cardinals believed, and feared that Montalto would not prove very favourable to his interests. With his accustomed prudence, however, he disguised his displeasure. Those around him were less discreet. The intimate friends of Granvella made no secret of their disappointment. They regretted that he had not been sent to Rome during the interregnum. His influence, they said, would have enabled them, probably, to make another choice.¹ The echoes of these not very flattering sayings soon reached the ears of the Pope. In Paris the news of his election was joyfully welcomed. Henry III. had suspected Gregory of favouring the recent rebellion of the Guise. The news of his death had dispelled these fears. The king was enchanted, and liked to believe what his ambassador led him to hope, and what, in a measure, was confirmed by Cardinal d'Este's letters. He lost not a moment in asking the Pope 'to help him in pacifying, as soon as possible, the unfortunate dissensions within his kingdom.' This cry of distress was not unmixed with a slight indirect threat, which showed how matters stood with him; for he added,² 'in helping me to maintain and preserve my State in peace and obedience, His Holiness will insure to the Holy See a kingdom that will be always devoted to it (provided Sixtus the Fifth goes against the League), and will particularly oblige a king who will never prove himself ungrateful.'

The Emperor ¹ expressed himself well satisfied, and his Vice-Chancellor declared it to be a good and holy election. The news had spread while the Court and the diplomatic body were still in chapel. The Spanish party were loud in their expressions of vexation. They had counted on Farnese. Ottavio Spinola exclaimed: 'If Farnese is not Pope, it is he who makes and directs them.' This phrase was rather laughed at, and might have been ridiculed with justice if the character of Sixtus V. had been known. The Grand-Duke of Tuscany, who had been informed of the election on the day itself, owing to a species of telegraph got up by the indefatigable Cardinal de' Medici, thought he had reason, and in fact had cause, to rejoice. The Pope himself, out of gratitude, as well as from political reasons, hastened to send him an affectionate message. 'Well,' exclaimed the Pope, on perceiving in the crowd Monsignor Gerini, with whom he had formerly been very intimate, 'will His Highness regret my nomination? Have you made it known to him?' The old prelate, who was one of the Grand-Duke's correspondents, had no words sufficient in praise of his election.² Another correspondent of the Grand-Duke, Sangaletti, gave him similar assurances. He was an old servant of Pius V., then already much attached to Peretti, and who, as his private cameriere, assisted at the last moments of Sixtus V.¹ Francis, however, had the good sense to moderate the zeal of his brother, who, certain that he could dispose of the Pope's will, fancied he had already done so, and was imprudent enough to tire him by all kinds of requests.² Francis advised him not to importune the pontiff, especially not to accustom him to refuse, 'for when a man meets with many refusals, he is looked upon as one who is displeased with his sovereign, and thus loses his good graces.'

At Venice,³ the notification of the 'Assumption' was made, according to custom, by the Nuncio, who appeared before the Senate, and exchanged with the members of the Council words of truth and wisdom. On both sides the diplomatic forms were strictly observed. The Nuncio was ignorant of the course which the new Pope was likely to adopt with regard to the Republic, which had formerly asked for his recall. On the other hand, the Sacred College, for the same reason, was very reserved, and rather anxious as to the attitude which the former Inquisitor, expelled from its territory, would be likely to take up. In Rome, however, Priuli was able, from his first conversations with the Pope, to see that His Holiness was very favourably disposed as regards Venice.

On the very day of his election, Sixtus V. made some important appointments. He named Cardinal Rusticucci Director of the Prince's Affairs as it was then called, of Foreign Affairs as it is now styled, in the place of Cardinal di Como, who was now to retire for good to his beautiful palace (Giraud), or to the Villa Mondragone, which he had bought of Altemps. Rusticucci had already held that important post under Pius V. Alesandrino was appointed to the direction of ecclesiastical affairs. In reinstating him in his functions, which he likewise had filled during the reign of Pius V., the Pope assured him that his intention was to give him all the authority which he had enjoyed during his uncle's pontificate. He allotted to him in the palace the rooms which San Sisto, the nephew of Gregory, had lately occupied. Both these appointments, which were made out of gratitude to the memory of his great benefactor, were also comprehensible, inasmuch as he could not confide the direction of affairs to his grand-nephews, who were both children. Giacomo, Duke of Sora, General of the Church, was confirmed in his command ; but the Pope, without giving any explanation, removed Mario Sforza, the Duke's lieutenant. Marquess Altemps, together with the charge of His Holiness' person, was entrusted with the government of the Borgo, and Monsignor San Giorgio with that of Rome. Monsignor Ghislieri filled the Pope's household with creatures of Pius V.¹

On the morrow the custodians of the capital presented themselves at the Vatican, asking for that which the people do not always get though they ask for it—justice, peace, and abundance. The Pope replied that they should have justice and no famine, as under another

Pope. This ill-timed allusion to Gregory was much criticised by those who heard it. He added that, 'to them he recommended the dispensation of justice, that they could depend on his support if they did their duty, and on the severest reprisals if they failed to do so, as he was resolved if necessary to have them beheaded.' The custodians left, paralysed with fear. Even the warmest adherents of the new Pope found these expressions rather too strong for a beginning.

In the official world, the severity of his language was excused by the necessities of his position, which required extreme sternness. Confidence was placed in the good sense and feeling of justice for which Peretti was known. It was not apprehended that he would become a Nero, but it was understood that he was certainly a Draco. His first acts were, however, better appreciated than his first speeches. He removed few people, desirous apparently to know the men with whom he had to deal before forming a government. The great appointments made during the first hours of his reign, because they could not be deferred, all bore the mark of being provisional. No one supposed the Duke of Sora's appointment to be a serious one, nor that of Rusticucci, whose incapacity for business was notorious, nor of Alessandrino, who was vain enough to believe himself to be the chief of the State under the new Pope. He confided this to Santorio, whispering in his ear: 'Do not let us tease the poor old man, for we shall be the masters.' Soon, however, it was seen of what little importance were these people, who had only been placed there to fill up momentarily posts which were destined to others, and which in the mind of the Holy Father were destined to himself; for from the very first days he transacted all his business with his secretary Azzolini, without the aid of the ministers holding those offices. The old servants of Pius V. were evidently favoured: the Pope knew them, and made use of them until he could select his men according to merit. From the outset he had to struggle against the effects of the prolonged retreat which had kept him away from public affairs. This serious inconvenience is well known in the case of those who return suddenly to public business. They must act because affairs cannot be delayed; but are deprived of aid, and therefore compelled to make use of men whom they have known formerly, but who do not any longer belong to the times—whom it is indispensable to have, since there is nothing else to be had, but whom it will be necessary, though cruel, to send away as soon as something better is found.

In his conversations Sixtus was wont to say that he did not wish to wage war, except if challenged to do so, but that he would organise a crusade against the Mussulmans. This idea had evidently taken possession of his mind since his youth, it may be even since his childhood; for in his family the horrors committed by the Turks on the other side of the Adriatic, which in the preceding century had determined so many Dalmatian families to emigrate, had not been forgotten. Such an idea, however, was not in harmony with the present state of things. The times when Christendom trembled on hearing of the taking of Constantinople, the times even of the battle of Lepanto, were over.

The danger caused by the progress of the Turks still existed ; but the state of Europe, which was deeply rent in two by the Reformation, rendered it impossible to think of any expedition in common against the Crescent. This new state of affairs was not sufficiently known to the old monk, rector, inquisitor, and hermit of the villa. In foreign politics he was a novice. The diplomatic envoys at his court soon perceived this, and resolved to turn each to his account that ignorance which was soon to make room for better judgment, thanks to his rare intuition and the vast horizons which from his throne he was enabled to survey.¹

Among those who, when the Conclave was at an end, had hastened to the Vatican, there to pay homage to the new pontiff, Duke Bracciano had been noticed with astonishment. He had audaciously found his way to the Pope's presence, and was pretty well received. It is said that the Pope gave him a strange look, which said more than the few commonplace observations by which he replied to the protestations of devotion from the assassin of his nephew. Vittoria, on the other hand, got in at Donna Camilla's, who had in vain refused to receive her, but who did so at last, and very ill, crying all the while. The Pope was rather displeased with the boldness of the young woman, but he always preserved a certain degree of affectionate sympathy for her. Might it not be alleged, with some speciousness, that she did not know who had committed the crime?

¹ Olivares often complains of the Pope's ignorance in this respect. 'Lo poco que el papa entiende en cosas de Estado y el quererlas guiar por su cabeza.' Olivares to Philip II. 1587.

Yes, if she were looked upon as not being at all quick or intelligent; but, unfortunately, everyone knew she was quite the reverse. The Duke, her husband, obtained a second audience at the request of Medici and Olivarès. His more than cold reception by the Holy Father made him understand that his position in Rome was no longer tenable. He got frightened, fled with all his family during the night; went first to Bracciano, and, not feeling safe there, to Padua; then to Salò, in the territory of the Venetian Republic.¹ During the Conclave, Marcello Accoramboni, one of Vittoria's brothers, and the man whom Orsini had employed to get rid of Francesco, had assembled a number of banditti at Bracciano. They dispersed when they heard of the Duke's flight. They supposed that some great event had taken place.

The state of affairs, it is manifest, was not satisfactory. Energetic measures were called for by such exceptional circumstances. Sixtus V. saw this, and evidently wished from the outset to terrify those who until then had terrified others with impunity. After frightening Rome the day after his election by his speech to the custodians, and having by a mere look alarmed on the following day the audacious and powerful chief of the Orsini in such a manner as to compel him to fly for safety, Sixtus, on the fourth day of his pontificate, performed an act of unprecedented severity. He had prohibited the wearing of arms. Four young brothers, who during the interregnum had served in

Sforza's band for the maintenance of order in Rome, were returning home, each carrying his arquebuse. They were stopped by the 'bargel,' and summarily condemned to death for having infringed the law against bearing arms. In the evening several cardinals threw themselves at the Pope's feet, reminding him that no execution ever took place before the coronation. The Pontiff was inexorable. On the morrow, two hours after sunset, the four brothers were hanged on the St. Angelo Bridge. This news was received in Rome with that silence which astonishment and horror produce, spreading alarm not only among the malefactors, but also, though wrongly—for they little knew Sixtus V.—terrifying those who had injured him in former times. Among these were the monks of the Holy Apostles, who had shown themselves his bitterest enemies from the first day of his stay among them. 'They hang down their heads,' some one wrote to the Grand-Duke of Tuscany, 'are furious with the election, but fear prevents their speaking of it.' The fact is that the Eternal City was in a state of consternation, and was rapidly reassuming the severe aspect of the Rome of Pius V. One look, one word, one act—a terrible one, it is true—had effected this change from the 24th to the 27th of April, that is, in the first four days of the reign of Sixtus the Fifth.

The Pope, however, had appointed governors to the several provinces. Castagna was named to the most important one, that of Bologna; Colonna to the Romagna, Cesi to the Marches, Spinola to Peruggia, and Lancellotto to the Campagna. Remembering how unsatisfactory his finances had been when he was only the poor cardinal, he doubled the 'dish,' making it 200 scudi a month, while to the cardinal-nephews of Gregory XIII., and to a brother of San Sisto, he only granted a pension of 100 scudi. The Roman barons became uneasy. The Sforzas felt that they were not in favour. The dismissal of Mario, and the execution of the four brothers who had worn their colours, were of bad augury.

On Wednesday, May 1, the coronation took place at St. Peter's, with the accustomed pomp, and in presence of a crowd of people, especially from the country. Cardinal de' Medici placed the tiara on the Pontiff's head. Besides the foreign ambassadors (who were all present, except the Spanish, who never went to a ceremony because he would have to give precedence to his French colleague), there were also present the envoys-extraordinary sent by the Grand-Duke of Tuscany to congratulate the new Pontiff, all the members of the Sacred College, the Roman princes, and the high prelates. The Pope was solemnly carried to the Church: the Marquis de Pisany acted as the Pontiff's train-bearer. One of the Japanese princes presented him with the water. To avoid any fighting, Sixtus suppressed the custom of throwing money to the people, and also the banquet to the Roman barons, on account of the dearness of everything. On Sunday, May 5, he took possession of the Lateran. He had spent the night in the Palace of San Marco, which, since the time of Pius IV., had become the residence of the Venetian ambassadors. The next morning, at the break of day, he proceeded to the Convent of Ara Cœli by the long aërial corridor which still connects the Capitol and the Venetian Palace. It was from this convent that the procession, composed of members of the Sacred College, the ambassadors (excepting, of course, the Spanish),¹ the Japanese princes, the barons, the prelates, and the Papal Court started. Everyone was on horseback, and the head of the procession was already opposite the first basilica of Christendom² when its tail was still winding round the declivities of the Capitol. When the ceremonies were over, the Pope gave the blessing from the balcony, sent away his suite, and, accompanied only by Cardinals Alessandrino and Rusticucci, spent the remainder of the day in his old hermitage, in his villa at the Thermæ of Diocletian.

On the 13th he announced the appointments in a consistory called for that purpose, and scandalised Rome as well as the cardinals by giving the purple gown to his grand-nephew Alexander, who was one day to become one of the ornaments of the Sacred College and a Pope-maker, but who was then only a child of fourteen.

² St. Peter's is only the second.

CHAPTER II.

THE CRUSADE AGAINST THE BANDITTI.

THE increasing severity of the measures to which the new Papal Government had recourse were variously judged. Among the people there was a general outburst of indignation, restrained, however, by the fear of drawing on themselves the resentment of this Government, at once so strong, so well-informed, and so ready to strike.¹

The corps diplomatique, and the cardinals who maintained a correspondence with foreign sovereigns, though they occasionally criticised the rigour of the Government—though they sometimes, but however seldom, blamed its excesses—fully approved the Pontiff,

¹ This is attested by the notizie, as the papers giving the news of the day were called, and which were circulated twice a week in Rome and in the country. The editors of these manuscript papers were called leaders (menanti), 'because they lead public opinion,' said the ambassador Michel Suriano; 'but they lead it without thought or discretion.' The Cardinal de' Medici complained of the great number of these papers, calculated to pervert public opinion, and Sixtus V. more than once treated the newsmongers with severity. These notices must not be confounded with the fly-sheets of the same name, which, as we have already mentioned, were added by the secretaries of the Venetian ambassadors to their official reports. The former were of great importance as contributing to form public opinion, and until of late years, during which the state archives have been opened to research, they were the chief sources of information to historians. These notices give an idea of the consternation and ill-humour of the Roman public during the first days of the reign of Sixtus.

who with an iron hand restored order within his dominions, and diffused the benefits of public security not only in his own capital, but indirectly throughout all Italy. The new Government, in these respects, won the approval of all.

Not only the States of the Church groaned under the terrorism exercised by banditti, but the kingdom of Naples¹ was equally infested by them, though the viceroys displayed extreme rigour in dealing with those who periodically disturbed the public peace. Those who were compromised tried to escape by making their way to the Roman frontier, and thus within a few months after the accession of Sixtus the fugitives arrived in vast numbers. Others retired to the mountains and became outlaws. At Naples, too, the dungeons were filled with political prisoners, and numerous executions took place. These severities, however, remained without effect through the inconsistency and partiality of the Government, the incoherence of its action, and the complete venality of its police. Humble people were hanged, and great personages were allowed to escape, in consideration of a fine. In Naples the viceroys were paralysed by the miserable inefficiency of their officers, and at Madrid by the intrigues of the Neapolitan aristocracy, who were more or less accessory to these disorders, but who were also more or less in favour at Court. Without doubt the government of Naples was very bad, but its worthlessness was even more the fault of circumstances than of the persons by whom it was conducted. Philip IV. hoped to mend matters by frequently changing his agents, but he merely increased the evil.

Central Italy was also far from being tranquil. In Tuscany, Romagna, and the two Marches there were numerous half-independent feudatories of the empire continually at war among themselves and disturbing public tranquillity. They employed in this private warfare the numerous 'fuorusciti' and 'masnadieri,' bandits who were brigaded together under the command of chiefs who sold their aid to the highest bidder, after the manner of the 'condottieri' of old. It was only on the main land, round Venice and in Savoy, that brigandage was comparatively kept down. Everywhere else it was terrible, and in the States of the Church had become intolerable, and even menaced the existence of the Government. In Venetia, Albanian troops, called 'capelletti,' employed especially for this service, seized upon the brigands, though at the same time they occasionally themselves laid violent hands on the peasants.

In Rome murders were committed in broad daylight, and much bloodshed in the streets was caused by the encounters between the young nobles and the sbirri, while bands of 'fuorusciti' drew near to the city and defiantly pitched their tents in the Campagna, half-way between Prima Porta and Ponte Molle, i.e. at the very gates of the city. There was no exaggeration in what Sixtus V. said, towards the end of his reign, to the Duke of Luxembourg, who was deploring the lamentable state of France, 'that he could well believe it, since he remembered what Rome was during the reign of his predecessor, when neither man nor woman was in safety in their own houses even in the middle of the day.¹ In short, towards the end of Gregory XIII.'s reign, the Eternal City was in a continual state of terror. Homicide, private revenge, and every kind of disorder had come to be treated as a matter of course. One morning, as the Cardinal Montalto was walking as usual in the streets, accompanied only by a servant, he suddenly found himself in the midst of armed men who were fighting. The head of the sbirri had carried off from the Orsini (Pio) palace, which was always filled with brigands, one of the most notorious of their number. It was an act of necessity, but constituted an infraction of the immunity which the dwellings of the great enjoyed. As he was carrying off his prisoner, they were met by a merry company of young men of condition, Raimondo Orsini, Savelli, Ottavio Rusticucci, Emilio Capizucchi, and others, all on horseback, and followed by their grooms. These all instantly attacked the 'bargel,' and a fight took place in which Rusticucci, some of the Orsini, and, by accident, the Cardinal's servant lost their lives. Montalto himself had great difficulty in gaining refuge in a neighbouring house; the Orsini complained of an infringement of the rights of their order, and fortified themselves in their palaces; their friends did the same. During three days desperate fights took place in the streets and in the courts of the palace, and there were wounded and dying men even within the walls of the Vatican. Cardinal Montalto was unable to go to his villa without an escort of fifty soldiers. The unfortunate 'bargel,' however, whose only fault arose from an excess of zeal, though justified by circumstances, had made his escape, well knowing the weakness of the Government. On the demand of the Orsini, however, he was arrested and put to death—a singular way of pacifying the town thus to sacrifice those who were supporting the law! In the meantime the Orsini had given orders to their retainers to arm themselves; and, besides having obtained satisfaction by the execution of the sbirro, they consented to disarm their followers and send away the banditti only after long negotiations and after the intervention of Cardinal de' Medici, who had much influence with the family. The Pope and the inhabitants of Rome had trembled for their lives during three days, the shops and places of public resort had been closed, and the houses of the rich were guarded by soldiers.

A mutual understanding had arisen out of the protection which the barons accorded to the banditti. The 'fuorusciti' enjoyed complete impunity in the country, thanks to the asylum which they found in the barons' castles; and, on the other hand, they were summoned to Rome when the nobles were at war, either among themselves or with the authorities. It was like the worst days of the Middle Ages. Even the commandants of the Papal troops reinforced themselves in the same manner, in order to make a stand against any aggressions on the part of their rivals. This happened in the case of Prosper Colonna, the cardinal's brother, who was on unfriendly terms, as we have seen, with the Baron Giacomo. Thanks, however, to the intervention of the cardinal, an affray was prevented between them. Though the banditti did not penetrate by force of arms into the city (as it was constantly feared they would), still they carried on their trade there by the same means which the brigands of Naples and Umbria had employed a few years before. There were some extremely audacious coups-de-main. The priest Guercino, one of the most dreaded chiefs, who called himself king of the provinces of the Campagna, had suspended the Bishop of Anagni from his functions, and had enjoined on the clergy and on the people that they should recognise only himself, Guercino, as their bishop and their king. He sent a threatening letter to Mgr. Odescalchi, demanding a sum of money. The prelate hastened to Gregory, who caused the bearer of the letter to be seized and put into prison. The prelate then received an intimation from the bandit chief, threatening him with imminent death; whereupon the Pope, at his entreaty, caused the brigand messenger to be set at liberty, and granted pardon to Guercino, with absolution for forty-four homicides. While the pardon was on its way to him he had committed new atrocities, had entered a castle and killed all whom he found there under arms.

Another day the carriage of Mgr. Mario Savelli, the cardinal's brother, was suddenly attacked by four strangers on horseback, and the prelate was killed by an arquebuse. This attack took place between the Porta del Popolo and the Ponte Molle, which was then already the rendezvous of the fashionable world, and at the hour of daily resort, in the midst of a number of carriages and of a crowd of people on foot, without anyone daring to stop the assailants. The Venetian ambassador wrote: 'The cause of this attack is unknown, but the town is struck with astonishment, owing to the rank of the victim, who is a prelate and a judge; the place, which is one much resorted to, and the hour (it was still daylight), as also because of the fact that Mgr. Mario was in his coach, which is considered equal to being in one's own house.'¹

The barons had gone back to the manner of olden times. Thus, notwithstanding the prohibition of the Pope, the Marquis of Ariano, nephew to Cardinal Cesi, left Rome, followed by 150 cavaliers, with the avowed intention of fighting one of the young Aguilars. The Pope detained the father of the latter as hostage; but this did not prevent much loss of life among the followers of these young nobles.

Such was Rome during the last years of Gregory XIII. It is to be explained by the state of the provinces, where the banditti were all-powerful. They could only enter Rome in a disguise, or with safe-conducts, which the Government granted them sometimes in great numbers, hoping thereby to render them inoffensive, an expedient which a Venetian ambassador rightly termed 'slow poison.'² The fear which extensively prevailed of a sudden attack on the part of the brigands, and of a new sack of the town, seems to have been but too well founded.

At all times brigandage has held a prominent place in the history of the people of the Latin race. The Italian brigands of our day, the bandits of the sixteenth century, the 'partidas' of Spain and the 'guerrillas' of Portugal, are distinguished from each other only by their local colouring. They have the same origin, they act in the same way, keep back in quiet times, without entirely disappearing from the scene, and reappear in times of war or internal troubles, when they become a real power, and attempt, like all powers, whether regular or irregular, to avail themselves of some name or cause, or of some principle. They try, in fact, to legitimise with a false appearance of right and justice the war which they wage on society. The doubtful characters among the population are attracted by them; and each village sends its contingent of ruined and worthless men, all, in short, who have reason to fear the arm of the law. In this way relations were established between the people and the banditti, who, miscreants as they were, earned by their bravery and their scorn of danger and of death a character for heroism—qualities which always strike the imagination. The peasants, thoroughly demoralised by fear and self-interest, connived at the deeds of the banditti, even rendering them passive assistance; and, in consequence, the commandants of the forces sent against them lost all means of obtaining information and local help.¹

¹ As I was travelling through Algarves, in the south of Portugal, in 1842, seven years after the civil war, I saw 3,000 regular troops held in check in the passes of La Sierra de Monchique by about 100 guerrillas, so-called Miguelists, who had become brigands. It was hinted to me that they would respect me in my capacity of foreign diplomatist, and that the only way to travel in safety would be to send my escort away. Similar cases are to be found among the Abruzzi, on the frontiers of Naples and in the environs of Rome. These malefactors always strove to give respecta-

Such is the history of brigandage in all ages. The origin of that which existed at the period of which we are treating may be traced back to the civil wars, to the local quarrels of the free towns and of the petty princes during the two preceding centuries, to the factions which at one time divided the Peninsula into two camps, to the Guelphs and the Ghibelines, and, lastly, to the military system of the 'condottieri.' Guelphs and Ghibelines were now of the past; there were no more free towns, nor petty tyrants exercising an absolute power which might be escaped by stepping across the frontier of their petty dominions, and there were no more 'condottieri.' Italy was the first country, after Spain, which adopted the ideas and forms of a modern State; but the memories of the past were not entirely effaced. Traditions were still extant of those periods—periods of violence, it is true, but also of liberty, a lost liberty which was still mourned, and which seemed to be defended by the bandit chiefs when they made war on established authority. These were the recollections invoked by the feudatories when they disturbed public peace by their personal quarrels. They were aided by the banditti, who were not only recruited in the country, as we have just seen, but in the towns also, and often among the higher classes, while their numbers were increased by malcontents, debtors, and many who were exiled for deeds of violence. Owing to these traditions and recollections, the bandit was not branded in public opinion with the same dishonour bility to their trade by assuming the cloak of politics, and wearing the colours of a party long after they had ceased to serve it by regular means.

which we, with our ideas, attach to a revolt against society. He was feared, pursued, and sent to the scaffold when caught; but he was not irrevocably dishonoured. At the most he was considered as an erring member of society, who could return to its bosom, and frequently did so; and obtained not only the sovereign's pardon, but sometimes even his favour, for he might occupy a great office either in the Government at home or abroad. Thus Ludovico Orsini, banished from Rome for a deed of vendetta, after having led for many years the life of a 'fuoruscito,' entered the service of Venice, like many of his ancestors, and obtained the important post of Governor of Corfu. Giovanni Battista, Signor del Monte¹ of the family of Julius III., formerly lieutenant-general of the Flemish light cavalry, solicited for his brother (through the ambassador Priuli) a command in the service of the Republic. This brother, to whom several imperial fiefs belonged, declared himself ready to go either to Candia or elsewhere, and offered to raise nearly 2,000 foot-soldiers on his own estates. He had been banished for an act which the Venetian ambassador considered somewhat extraordinary. This is the account he wrote of him to the Doge:—'This young man, of a very spirited and earnest character, was at variance with the authorities of Cività-Castellana. Fearing neither them nor any one in the town, he entered it in broad day, with eight bandit chiefs and 200 men; took possession of it, and put his enemies to death—a fate the Podestà would equally have shared had he not made his escape. If,' continued the ambassador, who considered this a spirited young man and the act a remarkable one, but blamed neither,—‘if your Serenity prefers to treat with him indirectly, I can offer the services of my brothers, to whom he shall make himself known.’ Thus deeds of violence were not considered a dishonour. The nobles ran the risk indeed of having their heads cut off on a scaffold hung with black, but they generally escaped being taken. The alternative was exile, and that naturally led to brigandage. If the exiled were a person of distinction, he put himself at the head of a party, and could depend on the support of the members of his family and on an asylum in their castles; then if he became tired of the trade, he could fall back on the pardon of his sovereign. He could also take service in France, in Spain, or in Venice. The States of the Church swarmed with large and small bands, who laid waste the country, though not nearly to the same extent as the regular troops; for the banditti were better disciplined, better clothed, better fed, and they spared the rural population when they wanted their help; while the soldiers belonging to the Duke of Sora, to Prosper Colonna, to Mario Sforza, were the terror of the peasantry, who called them slaughterers (amaz-zatori). Thus the defenders of public peace were more dreaded than its disturbers.

During the last years of Gregory XIII., the number of banditti who infested St. Peter’s territory varied from 12,000 to 27,000, a number which equalled, if it did not surpass, that of the regular troops in the service of the Italian princes. The most considerable were those of Alphonso Piccolomini, of Lambert Malatesta, and of the priest Guercino.

Alphonso Piccolomini, Duke of Montemarciano, of a noble Siennese family, and illustrious through one of its members, Pius II., had become in the reign of Gregory the real master of the Papal States. He used to enter them either from Pienza, which belonged to him, or from Pitigliano, where he was under the protection of his near kinsfolk, the Orsini. Sometimes he made descents on Rome, at others he indulged in raids on the Romagna and the two Marches. These movements were made with the rapidity of lightning. He almost always beat the troops sent against him, or, when he was worsted, he skilfully contrived to escape. He would then re-appear when he was least expected. One day he totally defeated, near Cattolica, 5,000 Papal troops with 200 men; another time he took a stronghold with only 100 or 150 followers, put the garrison to death, and returned in safety.¹

He wore his hair long, and the expression of his face struck terror. Many stories are told of his deeds, and, as he treated the peasants generally with kindness, he was almost as much loved and admired as he was feared by them. This highway hero was the terror of Gregory. He had announced his intention of entering Rome, putting the Signor Giacomo to death, and not leaving the place till he had been reinstated by the Pope in his confiscated possessions. He had several nobles belonging to the first families with him, who introduced the ways and customs together with the opulence of high station into their brigand life. They paid ready money for all they wanted, and their presence gave credit to the rumours that a political enterprise, supported by foreign money, had been undertaken against the Holy See. Much astonishment was justly felt at the scandalous inactivity of the Duke of Urbino, and still more at that of the Grand-Duke, who remained both of them deaf to the demands of the Court of Rome for assistance. Viela Orsini de Pitigliano made no secret of supporting his kinsman Alphonso. The only satisfaction which the complaint of the Pope gained from these three lay in vague excuses from Francis, while the Duke of Urbino sent an agent to try and exculpate himself on the score of weakness. Viela's excuse was that he could not be expected to be stronger than His Holiness.

The Venetian ambassador then interposed, but with no better success. It was openly said at Rome that the Italian princes saw with pleasure the difficulties of the Holy Father; and that they treated him with such little consideration because they had nothing to hope from him and were in no way afraid of him. Gregory, however, did not remain inactive. He formed a commission, consisting of some cardinals and of the Signor Giacomo, for the purpose of directing the movements of the troops; and, to add strength to his side, he adopted a most culpable expedient. He took into his service another bandit, one of the Baglione di Perugia, a mortal enemy of Piccolomini. Thus bandits were seen fighting side by side with the Papal troops—truly a deplorable sight! At last an arrangement was made by the Cardinal de' Medici, who had a hand in everything. The Pope, though he would not restore Piccolomini's confiscated property, compromised matters by granting a pension to his sisters; he took the price off his head, but would not revoke his banishment. The cardinal by his influence got the sentence of excommunication removed, and the celebrated bandit quitted for some time the theatre of his crimes.¹

Piccolomini indeed had disappeared, but his place was instantly filled by other chiefs, and, at the time of Gregory's death, these miscreants held their heads high in both Rome and the provinces. The very existence of the State was menaced by this calamity; for, evidently, the remedies used to cure it were insufficient, and the Government was accused by the Romans of feebleness and improvidence. In truth, it did not shine either by its energy or its intelligence, and it could be justly reproached with having allowed brigandage to assume inordinate proportions; but, then, great evils yield only to energetic measures, which imply qualities and resources in those that use them which Gregory certainly did not possess. As we have already seen, the banditti were not looked upon in the same light as ordinary criminals, and they could count, to a certain extent, on the sympathy of the people. The great employed them for their own ends, and the

Governments even held them in reserve for certain contingencies. This is sufficiently proved by the conduct of the Grand-Duke Francis. They had taken root in the country, favoured by these circumstances, and formed, so to say, an element in public life. Hence, to attack them seriously, and give up all idea of making a compromise with them, was in public opinion a chimerical enterprise; to make war on them to the knife—to extirpate them, in fact—was considered by public men dangerous in the highest degree. They feared great misfortunes from this policy, and a general rising in Italy, which was already so full of disturbing elements, and at Rome, at least, danger to the Pope's temporal power.

On the other hand, what would happen to the Holy See and to the Catholic religion itself if the Supreme Pontiff were forced to seek safety in flight, and abandon the Eternal City to the bands which were so evidently in the pay of unknown but powerful hands? Where could the head of the Church take refuge? At Avignon? There he would be menaced by the Huguenots. At the Court of the feeble Henry III.? In Germany, which was herself as agitated, and exposed to greater commotion? Should he beg an asylum from Philip II., become a good Spaniard, and give up his authority, his dignity, his independence into the hands of this Catholic and zealous monarch?

These were the questions which occupied the minds of everyone, and which we have seen repeated in more modern times. But it was necessary to do something at once, for if sharp and energetic measures were not taken against these enemies of society, they would, in all probability, take matters into their own hands and march on Rome.

Yet, when the state of the Government and country was considered, it seemed impossible to find an outlet from the difficulties ; for in such critical times it seems better to do nothing, to live from day to day as it were ; to rely, in short, on Providence, as both Governments and individuals are apt to do when they find themselves surrounded by difficulties created by their own improvidence and weakness. This was the case with Gregory. Sixtus V. acted very differently.

He began with that which was most urgent ; namely, the driving of the banditti away from the gates of Rome ; for they were there always, intercepting all communications, stopping the posts and robbing the messengers of the ambassadors. He increased the number of troops, and Prosper Colonna, having fallen ill, gave up the command to the cardinal, his brother. The field was at once taken against the banditti, who were driven back towards the frontiers of Naples. Great numbers of them were slain ; amongst others, the priest Guercino. After this success, the town councils of the small towns took courage and joined their efforts to those of the cardinal, with such good effect that before the end of the year the Campagna of Rome was freed from this scourge.

The Signor Giacomo Buoncompagni, being considered wanting in vigour by the Pope, was disgraced, and nominally replaced in his command as General of the Holy Church by young Michel Peretti. He escaped a more severe treatment by flight, and through his intimate connection with the Sforza family.

Neither did Mgr. San-Giorgio, the Governor of Rome, seem to Sixtus to be equal to his work. His place was given to Mgr. Pierbenedetti, who had long been intimate with Frà Felice, and he introduced a rule of terror which might be justified by the exigencies of the case, but which was considered by serious men, and indeed was, a grievous necessity. A number of Draconian sentences were pronounced against astrologers, fortune-tellers, card-sharppers, and blasphemers, against those who wrote indecent words or sentences on walls, against those who carried arms after sunset in the district allotted to the courtesans, and against those who afforded a refuge for banditti instead of giving them up alive or dead into the hands of the authorities. In one of these edicts all ecclesiastics are commanded to resume the tonsure and the dress of their order. The newsmongers (menanti) were menaced with death if they divulged anything which ought to remain secret or which was prejudicial to the honour of any private person. It appears, however, that capital punishment was, with few exceptions, enforced only in cases of homicide, and then with due legal forms, which were summary enough it is true.

Impunity could no longer be claimed from birth, position, connexions, or the ecclesiastical state. Some young nobles of the best families (amongst others, Virginio Orsini, Ascanio Sforza, and Marco Antonio Incoronati) had ventured to place cats' heads on pikes on the bridge of St. Angelo, in allusion to the numerous executions of the new reign. They were immediately arrested, and everyone expected that they would pay for this rash jest with their lives ; they came off, however, with the fright. Robert d'Altemps, a natural son of the cardinal of the same name, had carried off a young girl of the house of the Signor Frangipani. Notwithstanding the remonstrances of the cardinal, he was shut up in Fort St. Angelo, and kept there for four months, during which time he lay under the sentence of death, which he had incurred according to the law. This affair made much noise, even abroad, and the Sacred College resented the offence received by one of its members. It was impossible to discover what the Pope intended to do with the young man, and he only released him at last out of consideration for Count Hohenembs, his uncle, who came all the way from Germany to try to obtain his release.

Cardinal Guastavillani was put under arrest for disobedience. When the Cardinal de' Medici intervened in his favour, the Pope's answer was, 'We are much surprised at your tone. We intend to be obeyed here in Rome by all, as we expect afterwards to be obeyed by the princes.'

In a quarrel between two grooms of the Cardinal Sforza, some blood was shed, and the culprits made their escape. The Pope then commanded the cardinal (who hid himself) to give up his servants, threatening him with imprisonment in Fort St. Angelo if he did not obey. These measures created great discontent among the cardinals, but few dared show it. The only persons who openly complained were the Cardinals de' Medici and Farnese, and they felt secure, owing to their connections with the Courts of Florence and Parma. Farnese avoided, however, all intercourse with the Pope, and when he was obliged to go to the Vatican, people said he looked as if he were going to execution. Savello never appeared at the palace; he remained in retirement at Frascati, and attended neither the consistories nor the ceremonies of the Church.

More than forty years before, a parricide had been committed by Count Attilio Baschi of Bologna. The Pope ordered an inquiry to be made, and the Count, being found guilty, was executed. Captain Fossombrone, who had been an accomplice of Ludovico Orsini in the murder of Vincenzo Vitelli, was hanged, after having been tortured. Many other criminals, forgotten for many years, were indicted before the tribunals.

The public revenged themselves for these severe measures by putting the following dialogue into the mouths of St. Peter and St. Paul, whose beautiful statues are still at the entrance of the bridge of St. Angelo. St. Paul asked St. Peter 'why he carried a sack on his back?' 'Because,' answered St. Peter, 'I am going off, for fear of being judged for having cut off Malchus' ear.'

Nicolino Azzolino, captain of the pontifical guards, was executed for having wounded an ensign belonging to his company. Even his near relationship with the Cardinal Azzolino, the Pope's faithful friend and former secretary, could not save him. An incident which Cardinal d'Este considered at once serious and ridiculous, took place at the time of the special embassy of Count Daun de Zimbern and of Dr. Curtius, who were sent by the Emperor to yield obedience to the Pope, which means to compliment him on his accession. One of their 'staffieri' (an armed footman), having been surprised in the courtesans' quarter with his sword, was imprisoned, and, according to orders, received three blows with the lash. The ambassadors were loudly indignant at this insult. Count Zimbern wished to leave immediately, and was only kept back with great difficulty by his colleague, Dr. Curtius. It is true that the Governor of Rome hastened to apologise, but the ambassadors insisted that he should be punished. Their discontent was further increased by what Sixtus said on this occasion. 'He would do nothing in the matter,' wrote the Cardinal d'Este to M. de Villeroy; 'and had one of the ambassadors even been found in the same situation, he would have received the same punishment; and were the Emperor himself even at Rome, he would have to obey the laws laid down by His Holiness.' These are the words which the Pope used to his nephew, jesting as he usually did after supper with seven or eight of his intimates. They repeated this speech when they left, and it was soon spread through the whole of Rome. An inquiry was appointed, and the imperial ambassadors received a sort of half satisfaction. However, a much more important event marked the first months of the reign of Sixtus.

The Pepoli of Bologna were one of the first families of Upper Italy, and their chief, Count Giovanni, who was already advanced in years, enjoyed great and apparently well-merited esteem. Some bandit having taken refuge in one of his castles, the papal legate demanded his immediate extradition. This Pepoli refused, on the grounds that his castle was a fief of the empire. On hearing this, the legate sent some sbirri to carry off the bandit by force, but they failed in this attempt and were driven back by the Count's retainers. When the news reached the Cardinal, he had Pepoli himself arrested—a bold act, which might have led to serious disturbances, considering the feeling which then prevailed at Bologna. The Pope, however, approved of the Cardinal's conduct, and charged the Count, under pain of death and confiscation of his property, to deliver up the bandit. It was in vain that the Duke of Ferrara and the Cardinal d'Este, both nearly connected with the Pepoli, employed every means to save their friend. The Holy Father remained inexorable. He answered 'he had set Count Giovanni at liberty when he had been imprisoned in Rome during the preceding reign precisely for his connexion with the banditti, and as this noble had so soon fallen again into the same fault, he had decided to let justice take her course.' D'Este then hastened to dispatch a messenger to Bologna to inform the Count of his danger, and entreat him to comply with the Pope's demands. But the old nobleman remained unshaken in his resolution, and even irritated the Pope further by claiming the protection of the Emperor, and imprudently wrote (in a letter which was intercepted) 'he hoped soon to be out of the hands of this monkish tyrant.' He was condemned to death and strangled in prison, and his property, which was worth more than sixteen million dollars a year, was confiscated. He was mourned by everyone at Bologna, where he was universally beloved; but though the indignation caused by his death was so great, no one dared show it openly, and the town remained quiet, notwithstanding the proverbial turbulence of its inhabitants, their fear getting the better of their anger. Many of the nobles, however, who had not clear consciences, fled from their palaces and took refuge in the territories of the neighbouring princes; a great number went especially into the Republic of Venice. This severity was, at Rome, considered excessive. With feelings of grief and anger Cardinal d'Este thus wrote to M. de Villeroy: 'Everyone who knew this excellent nobleman and what has happened, feels horrified; and both learned and ignorant are agreed in saying that it is manifest injustice.' That, however, was not the opinion of everyone. Babbi, the Tuscan secretary, merely says: 'It is necessary with the Pope not only to weigh each word one says, but also to keep a sharp look-out;¹ he is difficult to please in everything, but he never does wrong to anyone.' The Venetian ambassador wrote thus to the Doge: 'The nobles, who are subjects of the Church, will leave the country as much as they can when they see this severity and the little respect paid to them; but, on the other hand, it is believed that this severity will be very useful to the public peace, for everyone will be warned that he must live sensibly and show deference and respect to his prince.'

This fearful act of severity, which was, however, but strict justice, as Pepoli was a subject of the Pope and had legally incurred the penalty of death, was also an act of great boldness, considering the state of Bologna, as we have said ; but still more so considering the state of Italy and the connexion which seemed formed between some of the chiefs of the great bands and the French Huguenots. But all these dangers the Pope braved, and struck that decisive blow which produced so deep an impression not only in Italy but also in other countries. He had scarcely been four months on the throne before Europe had learnt to know his indomitable energy.

As he did not consider that a class is dishonoured because some of its members are punished when they have become unworthy of belonging to it, he did not deal more leniently with the ecclesiastic or the monk than he had dealt with the cardinal or the baron.

A friar, having imposed upon the credulity of many devout persons by causing an image of St. Mary to work miracles, was marched from one end of the Corso to the other and then flogged. A Franciscan, guilty of several crimes, was hanged on the bridge of St. Angelo; two brothers of the Transpontine order were sent to the galleys. An ecclesiastic, Don Annibal Capello, one of the newsmongers who had been the most decried, was cruelly executed on the bridge of St. Angelo, after having been degraded at San Salvatore, in Lauro. Before he expired on the gibbet he had his hands and his tongue cut off. A list of his crimes was written up on a board, stating that he had during many years spread about false news, calumniated people of all ranks, insulted the worship of saints by exhibiting obscene statuettes, and corresponded with heretical princes.

A mother who had sold her daughter's honour was hanged on the bridge of St. Angelo, and the girl was forced to witness the execution, dressed in rich clothes given her by her seducer, who had taken flight. 'This was a blamable sight and act,' wrote the Venetian ambassador, 'which much displeased the town.' An impostor, who called himself a relation of the Cardinal Guastavillani, and who had sold false bulls in Spain, expiated his crime on a gilded gibbet.

Rome looked on in silence at these executions. Only Marforio and Pasquino, those two old statues that are still to be seen at the Capitol and at the corner of the Braschi Palace, kept their freedom of speech. Marforio always asks, and Pasquino always answers. The witty, often cutting, sayings which were ascribed to them amused the public, who took their revenge in this way on the severities of the Government. The name of Sixtus V. acted like a spell on the lower orders. All that passers-by had to do in a street quarrel, in order at once to separate the combatants, was to call out, 'Remember that Sixtus the Fifth reigns!' and mothers quieted their children by saying to them, 'Hush! Sixtus is passing by!'

CHAPTER III.

MEASURES TAKEN BY SIXTUS FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF BRIGANDAGE.

THE POPE had no sooner entered the Lateran, an act by which the pontiffs take official possession of their powers, than he called the attention of the ambassadors of Germany, of Spain, of Venice, and of the Grand-Duke to the great question of brigandage. Peremptory orders, written in the same sense, were forwarded to the several nuncios. Sixtus addressed himself personally to his friend and former protector Francis, whose co-operation, owing to the geographical position of their States, and when it was a question of re-establishing order in Italy, was of the highest importance. 'Help me,' he wrote with his own hand,¹ 'to find out these brigands, who, to the misfortune of the people and the shame of the Holy See, lay the country waste.'

The good intelligence between the Grand-Duke and the Doge was a powerful guarantee of security for Italy. Such had already been the opinion of Gregory XIII.² Sixtus V. adopted the views of his predecessor in this respect, and hastened to obtain a better understanding between the two Governments than was often the case. He recommended Francis to give a good reception to the Venetian envoys who were sent to Rome to congratulate him, and who had to pass through Tuscany. The Venetians having been the objects of much attention in Florence, the Pope expressed his gratitude to the Grand-Duke, and hinted, at the same time, at the advantages of a close union between the three States,—‘a necessary union,’ he said to Alberti, ‘and one which constitutes the object of all my solicitude; for it would paralyse the efforts of any enemy against one or the other of the three States; while their not harmonising with one another might occasion the most fatal results.’¹ To dissipate the clouds which were for ever appearing on the Grand-Duke’s horizon, and darkened even the still wider circle of the Republic of Venice, seemed to him to be a task of the utmost importance. When Cardinal Cornaro, an enlightened and conciliatory man, was about to return to his diocese of Padua, the Pope commissioned him to see the Grand-Duke, and Bianca Capello, his wife, on passing through Florence, and to make them understand all the advantages of a cordial understanding with their powerful neighbours; but, while holding such language, to appear as if he spoke of his own accord, and not to put the Pope’s name forward, so that, in the event of not succeeding, his supreme authority should not be compromised. The Cardinal did as he was bid,² and, thanks to these constant efforts, the difficulties which had subsisted between Venice and Tuscany lost much of their gravity.

The King of Spain had promised to help in the suppression of brigandage. The Dukes of Ferrara and Urbino were equally well disposed to favour this end ; but at Venice, where there was, however, no lack of goodwill, the question offered many serious difficulties, as affecting a principle which the Republic had for years maintained, that of giving an asylum to every proscribed subject. Whoever set foot on the territory looked upon himself as saved. There was no inquiry into the causes which had led to the exile, nor was there yet at that time any distinction between ordinary crimes and political misdemeanours. The Republic afforded its powerful protection to every refugee, whoever he might be. It was clear that as long as the Republic maintained its right of giving hospitality to everyone without distinction, the evil could not be remedied. The Pope therefore asked, through his nuncio, that a public declaration should be made in the senate to the effect that henceforth every man out of the pale of the law, or banished by the Pontifical Government, should not be received in the town or continent of Venice. He offered to do as much with regard to the Venetian outlaws. It was indirectly proposing an extradition treaty—that is, introducing into international law a principle which was unknown up to that time, and contrary to the political traditions of the Republic. These overtures were not favourably met. The nuncio obtained nothing, and the Pope was obliged to enter into personal negotiations with the Ambassador Pisany. 'What I want,' said he,¹ 'is that people should live in peace in the States of the Church, and the best means of obtaining this end will be to deprive the evil-doers of any chance of escape. Every prince in Italy and His Catholic Majesty have given me the assurance that they will refuse them an entrance into their territories; I trust the Doge will do as much, otherwise I shall question his good-will towards me. It is sufficient that an order in this sense should be published. I shall not object to these men being enlisted in the service of the Republic, and sent either to Candia, or Corfu, or other distant country, but not to Dalmatia, whence they could easily return to my States. As to the lords and gentlemen of my States, I do not object to their being well received by the Doge; but when it is a question of the respect due to the Holy See, which must have more weight in the eyes of the Republic than a mere individual, I cannot believe, nor does it appear to me right, that the Republic should favour rebels. I hope that during my reign this will not occur; but should it do so, provided the case is not an extreme one, a line sent to me through the ambassador will be sufficient, albeit that the general declaration has been published.'

These fresh propositions, which were moderate in tone, and more in harmony than were the first with the ideas and customs of the Venetians, met with the approbation of the Republic, which endeavoured to reconcile the question of principle with the Pontiff's requests.

A concordat was signed, by the terms of which the Republic engaged not to admit on its territory those who should be expelled from the Roman States by Sixtus V., and henceforth her co-operation was never found to be wanting. Eight months after these first steps, the Pope could flatter himself that he had obtained great results. He told the Envoy Grilli that the King of Spain had written to congratulate him, and with good cause, since the banditti had at one time formed a regular army, which, in concert with the Turks or the Huguenots, could have done a deal of mischief.¹ In almost each of his interviews with the ambassador he recurs to the subject. Sometimes he merely confined himself to the most striking misdeeds, at others spoke of the minutest acts of brigandage. He deplored the weakness and inaction of the governors appointed by his predecessor, thanked the Republic for its useful co-operation, and, by making it a witness of his indefatigable energy in the repression of that crime, excited the same active zeal on its part.

Some of these intimate conversations were, however, at times a little stormy. 'So their Venetian lordships,' he once said to Gritti, looking at him fixedly with a sarcastic smile, 'wish to make a Venetian nobleman of Garzetta?'² For goodness' sake beg of them to deliver him up to us.' Then he enumerated his grievances at length, recalled all those which the Republic had against Gregory XIII., pointing out, on the other hand, how gracious he had been towards it, but ever and anon referring to the brigand who had been condemned to death, pardoned through the intervention of the Duke of Ferrara, and only sent to the galleys when he should have been executed. In fact, the Pope wanted his extradition, in order to hang him. 'Were you to ask for our nephew, Cardinal Montalto, supposing he had committed Garzetta's crime, we would hand him over to you,' he exclaimed. Thus it was that, to attain his end, he alternately got angry and gentle, praised and blamed, without, however, ever showing that his sympathies were not for the Republic, nor his wish otherwise than to agree with her. Neither the Senate nor the ambassador doubted the Holy Father's perfect sincerity, and, notwithstanding these wranglings, and other such little difficulties, the relations between Rome and Venice were, and ever remained, on a good footing.

This was not the case as regards the Grand-Duke. Quite a coldness had succeeded the intimacy which formerly existed. Francis had reasons for not pursuing the brigands. In time of war they might prove useful allies to him; and in any case, if he spared them, he secured his States from their attacks. Deaf to the entreaties of Gregory XIII., who had vainly asked for his co-operation, and replying evasively to all his entreaties, he intended to do the same with Sixtus V., who, on that account, was exceedingly displeased. This equivocal conduct paralysed the effects of his proceedings. To be likened to his predecessor seemed to him as a kind of further outrage. It was sufficient to fire him with anger.

Since Piccolomini had been disposed of, Lamberto Malatesta was undoubtedly the most formidable chief of the brigands. He belonged to the illustrious family which formerly at Rimini had reigned almost as sovereign princes. He ravaged the Romagna, Umbria, the Marches. His audacity was equalled only by his successes, by the terror which he spread among the population, and by the defeats he inflicted on the Pontifical arms. Not content with ransacking the country, he attacked and took fortified castles. One night he dared to scale the walls of Imola, one of the most important towns of the Romagna. His basis of operations was Tuscany. Like Piccolomini, he found security there, good winter-quarters, and whatever he needed to revictual and recruit his men. Sixtus V., furious at so criminal a tolerance, protested incessantly at Florence, either through his Nuncio, or through the medium of Alberti, the Tuscan envoy in Rome. Not only did the former not succeed, but he was actually badly treated. Francis first rendered himself inaccessible, then made him wait for several hours, and altogether showed him, by his conduct, that he was resolved not to act. Cardinal de' Medici, having refused to interfere with his brother, the Pope had recourse to an extreme measure. He wrote himself to the Grand-Duke,¹ 'I am in the greatest perplexity, and do not know whether I shall be able to write to your Highness what I have to say, having received so much kindness from you, not only in my present position, but at a time when I occupied a more humble station. If I ever trusted a living man, I may say my hope now rests in you alone. And yet you tolerate that Lamberto Malatesta, a man who has been discarded by the Holy Church, should levy men in your States, to the detriment of mine. You are witness of the fact, and you say nothing; while I, not to be wanting in the respect which I owe you, am obliged to tolerate this to my shame, and to become thus the object of public ridicule. I have authorised your Highness by a brief to pursue the banditti even upon the territories of the Church. Grant me at least the equivalent favour. I beg you to answer me—to act so that this man shall not increase his forces, and that our neighbours may not any longer laugh at us.'

On the same day a Consistory was held. The Pope denounced Malatesta's proceedings, and complained in most vehement terms of the conduct of Francis, to whom he had shown so much affection, and who repaid him so ill. More than forty cardinals and prelates had heard these words. They soon were rumoured in Rome, and produced a certain sensation. On leaving the Consistory, Sixtus sent Cardinal Lancelotti to Monsignor Alberti, to inform him that if Malatesta was not at once given up to him, he would have recourse to coercive measures. If he could be believed, he was resolved to go to war with Tuscany. On the eve of this occasion, at supper with his intimate friends, he had already let out hints of this nature. It was a regular storm, and while the Tuscan agents admitted that all that the Pope said when he was angry or in conversation with his friends was not to be taken for granted, they nevertheless advised their master not to prolong his resistance. Alberti had an interview with the Pontiff, and implored of him to make his complaints known at Florence either through himself or his own Nuncio, but not through the medium of the public.

The Grand-Duke did what he was asked to do with a good grace. Malatesta was arrested and sent to Rome. Meanwhile the Pope wrote to the Tuscan prince to recommend that, as a measure of precaution, Malatesta should be made to swallow an antidote, so as to prevent his poisoning himself on the way. Sixtus V. believed that Malatesta had brought a poison with him from France, which he always carried about his person. The reasons why the Pope attached so much importance to his being handed over to him alive were founded on certain intercepted letters, which showed that he was in political relations with Marshal Lesdiguières.

The arrival of Malatesta in Rome was the signal for many to leave who feared that his revelations might compromise them. This showed how numerous were the allies he had managed to secure, as well as how vast were his designs. It would seem that he had conceived nothing short of the invasion of Italy by Protestant princes, with the object of destroying the Papacy. Malatesta was to co-operate with his gang of men. Was Sixtus V. well informed? Did the avowals of Malatesta justify these apprehensions? We know not. The suit against him lasted six weeks, and ended by his being condemned.¹ Out of consideration for the family, or because he was found to be less of a criminal than had been believed, he was only decapitated. The Pope, satisfied, resumed his good relations with Francis, wrote him an affectionate letter assuring him of his friendship, and sent him word through Monsignor Alberti, that 'he loved him always as much as and more than any other Prince.'

Autumn of the year 1587 had come. Two years and some months only had passed since Sixtus had been made a Pope, and already he could say that brigandage had ceased. The preceding winter he had complained to M. de Pisany² that 7,000 only out of 27,000 of these miscreants had been punished; but now he looked back with pleasure and compared Rome under Gregory XIII. with what it was under himself.

Pisany, speaking to him on one occasion of the misfortunes of his country, said, 'My sovereign is a great king, a very Christian and a courageous man, who could not but be jealous if he saw that your Holiness approved of his Catholic and Huguenot subjects forming separate parties in the kingdom, and entering into engagements with foreign elements merely

¹ Sixtus wrote to the Grand-Duke on May 8, 1587: 'Acciochè si possa intendere che intelligenza era la sua con Lesdiguières.' The minutes of the suit, which I have not been able to discover, would be valuable if they actually showed that there was a secret intelligence between the banditti and the Huguenots. The Pope was convinced of it, and the events which succeeded one another, such as the banditti invading Rome, recruiting in Tuscany, and corresponding with the party of action abroad, must strike the observer.—Gritti, 1587. to serve their own ambition and interests under the pretext of religion. He could not tolerate what your Holiness would not permit his own subjects to do, viz., to arm and concert with the foreigner.' 'He did not show himself displeased,' writes Pisany; 'he said I was right, and told me that he had well weighed all the remarks I had made. Naming all his principal subjects who, by their credit or power, might be capable of injuring the State, he added, "There is not one of those whom, if he dared shelter one single man whom I should suspect in the least, I would hesitate to behead; much less could I endure his arming and compromising the safety of the realm."'

Talking with Cardinal de Joyeuse, Sixtus said, 'Two things are necessary—severity and plenty of money.' 'And then,' writes that cardinal, 'the Pope made a long speech, showing how necessary it is for a prince to be feared and dreaded, not only by his own subjects, but by strangers; never to allow anyone, either far or near, to boast over one; and adding, in self-commendation, that, on his elevation to the throne, he had found the Pope's authority much diminished in Rome itself, as well as in the rest of Italy, but that he had raised it; that the Italian princes had then little good feeling existing among themselves, nor much respect for the Vicar of Christ; that the principal families in Rome were in feud with each other, all being agreed, however, in not caring what the Pope might do to, or think of, them; that the whole of the Ecclesiastical State was overrun by proscribed malefactors from other States; but that in a very short time he had compelled the most important to submit, and had dispersed or exterminated the brigands.'¹

The Pope was not saying too much. In Rome, as in the provinces, he had revived the respect for the law. While raising the authority of his government, he had procured a renewed peace and tranquillity in the States, and to his subjects a prosperity unknown under his predecessor. By means which, it is true, are repugnant to our present feelings, and which even then could only be justified by the requirements of an extreme case, he had succeeded in tranquillising the good and in frightening the wicked. His severities visited the latter, but never the peaceful citizens. He was not a sovereign who believes his authority to be in danger because his subjects are impatient to get rid of him, and who on that account has recourse to exceptional measures. His enemies were those of society in general—outlaws who had committed crimes, and not political refugees: they were brigands who paralysed the action of Government, demoralised the people, stopped all commercial enterprise, and who, in the hands of foreigners, of Huguenots, Protestant princes, or Turks, might become the instruments of his fall. They had already grown into a power incompatible with his own, and one which it was necessary to attack by every means at his command, to fight seriously, and conquer at any cost. As for the generality of his subjects, they had no idea of depriving the papacy of its temporal power, or of giving themselves another sovereign. Such theories were not then current in the minds of the Romans, and Sixtus V., when he began his reign with such severe measures, meant to protect his subjects as well as himself against the attacks of a common enemy, and by no means to keep them by force under a rule which no one disputed. When, at the death of the Duke of Parma, Cardinal Farnese requested leave to levy men on the Pontifical territory to maintain the Parmesans in their obedience to Duke Alexander, he at once refused, saying, 'that States were to be maintained by gentleness and affection, not by force and violence.'¹

CHAPTER IV.

THE POPE AND THE FRENCH KING.

Soon after his accession, Sixtus resolved to replace his Nuncio in Paris, Monsignor Bergamo, by the Archbishop of Nazareth.¹ Acting according to established usage, he warned the French ambassador, who, either from want of experience or thoughtlessness, did not leave the acceptance of the choice to his sovereign, but seemed, either by speech or by his silence, to approve of the selection made. Monsignor Fabio Mirto Frangipani, Archbishop of Nazareth, had passed through a long and honourable career. He had grown old in the service of the State. Formerly Pope's Nuncio at the court of Charles IX., and governor of several important provinces, he was looked upon as one of the most distinguished members of the high clergy. But he had been unfortunate enough to displease Cardinal de' Medici. The latter was so hostile to him that, immediately after the election, he had entreated Sixtus V. never to employ him; but the Pope replied that his conscience did not allow of his depriving himself of the advice of so enlightened a man, especially at a time when men of capabilities were scarce.

Medici did not hold himself beaten. He threw himself at the feet of Cardinal d'Este, and supplicated him to interfere so as to prevent an appointment which he feared. Being a Neapolitan by birth, and therefore a subject of Philip II., intimately connected with the members of the Spanish faction in the Sacred College, specially protected by Olivarès, Rusticucci, and the Farnese, no wonder Monsignor Frangipani was little acceptable to the Cardinal Protector of France, to whom his appointment to Paris was as displeasing as it was to Medici. To decide Pisany to withdraw the tacit or explicit adhesion which he had given, D'Este assured him that he himself had heard the Cardinal once say, that the only means of saving France was to make the Duke of Guise king. This was quite enough, as may be conceived, to fire the ambassador of Henry III. with indignation. He therefore joined issue with Cardinal d'Este, but their joint intervention only indisposed Sixtus V. against them. To calm him, they at last both offered to write themselves to the King of France, and showed him their letters, which were intended to do away with the objections which His Majesty might raise against the new Nuncio. The Pope praised their conduct, warning them at the same time not to write other letters in a contrary sense. He made them responsible, he said, for the difficulties which Nazareth might meet with in the fulfilment of his mission; and, if the slightest annoyance was offered to his ambassador, he would refuse them any further audience. Meanwhile he ordered the archbishop to return at once if the slightest obstacle was placed in his way to France.

On the other hand, the Archbishop of Nazareth had a rather sharp explanation with Cardinal d'Este. He retorted upon him the accusations with which he had been visited, recalled to his memory their common stay in France, their intimate conversations, and how the Cardinal then seemed to entertain that combination in favour of the Guises with which he was now reproaching him. He asked him why he had not then informed the King against him—in fact he defended himself as best he could. Cardinal de' Medici vainly recalled the fact that, in the time of Julius III., when people were so frequently prosecuted for heresy, Nazareth had been had up before the Inquisition. The Pope maintained his nomination, and the archbishop started for his new post.

Cardinal d'Este was all the more mortified that every one knew of his endeavours to prevent his departure. It was known that the French cardinal had failed, and that the Holy Father had disregarded his opinion respecting the choice of the new Nuncio. D'Este saw that his authority was as much compromised in Rome as in Paris, and in his displeasure demeaned himself to an act unworthy of him, but which passion and fear, those bad counsellors, impelled him to commit. He caused the letters which the Pope had seen to be followed by others, of a more secret nature and conceived in an opposite sense, begging of the King not to receive Monsignor Nazareth at once, but to protest against his nomination, on the ground of his former intimate relations with the chiefs of the League.

On arriving at Lyons, the Nuncio found letters from the King, enjoining him not to proceed further for the present. M. de Pisany was entrusted with the painful duty of informing the Pope.

This envoy had, as was seen, hailed with enthusiastic pleasure the accession of Sixtus. He believed himself called to exercise a preponderating influence over the Pontiff, and had made known to his Court the hopes which he entertained, but which were only illusory. Such illusions are more frequent than is generally believed in diplomatists who are to deal with a new sovereign. When Governments are newly born, out of a victorious enterprise or out of a regular rotation of established institutions, as is the case in Rome, they ever shed around them, whatever difficulties attend them, an atmosphere of youth and freshness, which, while it excites hope, opens a brilliant future to the ambitious. It is the honeymoon of the latter. All who are connected with the Government are confident in the future; they live from day to day, ask nothing of power but what it can give in the shape of rejoicings, and leave all trouble for the morrow. Nothing is so dangerous for diplomatic agents as to allow themselves to be seized by this malady ; nothing, however, is more difficult to avoid. Let them well weigh the state in which the newly-born Governments find themselves. Still somewhat surprised at their own existence, not prepared to face the exigencies of the moment, without any fixed ideas as to the course which they should follow in foreign matters, they must gain time, and therefore avoid all hazardous topics. This state of things often creates a false sense of security. Anxious not to displease anyone, they smile upon everyone, and meet the advances which are wrongly made to them at the outset by tokens of a commonplace kindness which often delude, but do not deceive men of sense. Cleverness, experience, habit of the world, knowledge of affairs, are not always sufficient to secure a man against the fatal effects of new Courts. Even Cardinal d'Este was not proof against them ; Medici and Pisany were greatly blinded by them.

John of Vivona,¹ called De Torettes, Lord of St. Gouard, Marquis of Pisany, Knight of the King's Orders, Colonel of the Italian Light Cavalry, Seneschal of Saintonge, recently appointed ambassador of the Very Christian King to the Court of Rome, where he had arrived during the interregnum, was a loyal and brave man, a true knight of the old style, quick, punctilious, ever ready to draw his sword, intelligent, and devoted to his master. Stephen Pasquier praises him greatly. He calls him 'one of the wisest men we have ever given breath to in France, of whom I can say, as a man who saw it (for I had the honour of seeing him frequently), that he never drank either water or wine or any other liquor, just as the man who lived without drinking, but indulging instead in fruit, of which he was very fond and took much.' His house—the Lanti Palace, near St. Eustache, which was then the property of the Grand-Duke of Tuscany, and where he lived with his wife, a Savella—was the rendezvous of the flower of the young Roman nobility. High play was carried on, greatly to the disgust of the Pope, who, however, would not allow the Governor to interfere with the privileges of an ambassador. After the death of Henry III., Pisany rallied to the new Government, went back to the army as colonel of light cavalry, and died in Rome as the ambassador of Henry IV. His ingenuousness could not be altogether ascribed to his century or to the military turn of his mind. Thus, on one occasion, the Pope asked for the extradition of a brigand in order to execute him. The marquis recommends M. de Villeroy 'to gratify the wish of His Holiness, provided it be no one whom His Majesty has any affection for, or can render him any good service.'¹ Complaining of the conduct of the Duke of Nevers, he accuses him, in a letter to the King,² of having said 'that your Majesty is pusillanimous and incapable of governing;' promising if he got near him 'to be as wanting in respect to him as he saw that he was wanting in it towards the King.' Then he added: 'The Duke intends to leave this place in ten or twelve days, and will be soon followed by the Cardinal de Vendôme.

² Pisany to Henry III., June 7, 1585.

If your Majesty would give orders for them to be arrested on their return, it would, I think, be easy, and a good thing, to teach them to be wiser.' On another occasion, being ill in bed, he regrets that he cannot get up to punish with his own hand some insubordinate attaché.

From the moment of his arrival Cardinal d'Este had taken possession of Pisany. The first months all went well. The representative of Henry III. enjoyed the little favours with which the Pope overwhelmed him. Thus Gregory XIII. had suppressed the intervention of ambassadors of great Powers in the ceremonies at St. Peter or in the Sistine Chapel. At the request of Pisany Sixtus V. rescinded this order. At all times there had been difficulties as to precedence between the Spanish and French ambassadors. The Pope decided in favour of the latter, following in this the example of Pius IV. Pisany attached the greatest importance to this, and believed his authority henceforth to be most solid and for ever ensured.

Before informing the Pope of the royal injunction by which the progress of the Archbishop of Nazareth had been stopped, the ambassador took care to communicate to him another piece of news which could not but please him—that of the peace which had been signed by the treaty of Nemours between the King and the League. This communication once made, the ambassador hinted at the protest of his sovereign against the appointment of the new Nuncio. Sixtus replied that as to the treaty of Nemours he reserved his opinion, as he was not yet acquainted with its conditions; but as regards the Archbishop of Nazareth, he requested him to inform the King that he was much distressed at the treatment of which he had been the subject, and never would have believed that a king supposed to be Christian could so far violate the right of nations in the person of a representative of the Holy See. When M. de Pisany referred to the intimacy of the Nuncio with the Duke of Guise, the Pope stopped him and said, 'You surprise me. How! when peace is made between your king and the duke, and they have become friends, their subjects should be suspicious of one another!' On the following day Cardinal de Rambouillet went to the Pope to avert the storm which was impending, but obtained nothing. Without completely exonerating Cardinal d'Este, the Pope complained especially of the ambassador, and with justice accused Medici of being the instigator of the intrigue.

Letters from the Nuncio relating what had passed, and announcing his immediate return, having been received on the following day, the Pope ordered the French ambassador to leave Rome within four-and-twenty hours, and the Pontifical States within six days. He gave Count Olivarès himself all the details of this affair, because he knew, he said, that he was speaking to a statesman who would give his Government a faithful account of it. The Spanish ambassador, while admitting the Pontiff's grievances, begged of him, however, as a statesman, and certain that in doing so he would be approved by his master, to allow this incident to be settled amicably.

offices, on his own authority at first, and afterwards by express order of the Republic, which was much alarmed at this commencement of a rupture between France and the Holy See.

As for M. de Pisany, the order fell upon him like a thunderbolt. He at once went to Tivoli, where Cardinal d'Este was laid up with the gout. Several cardinals had in vain interceded with the Pope, who was inexorable. Behind his anger, however, it was clear that, while wishing to assert his rights, the Pope did not wish to break altogether with the French King, who, in the mind of Sixtus, however unable to do good, that is to extirpate heresy from his States, was always able to do harm, by seeking the aid of the Huguenots against the Guise, should the latter, which was very possible, notwithstanding the lately signed peace, take up arms afresh. Indignant as he appeared to be, the Pope did not lose sight of these important considerations. He also depended upon the penury in which Henry III. was at that time, and which was so great that he had been obliged to make the most pressing demands in Rome to obtain authorization for the alienation of some church property. This calculation in the mind of the Pope did not escape the sagacity of D'Este. He therefore requested Pisany to await at Tivoli the issue of his negotiation, started for Rome, and was at once received in audience by the Pope.

Again the Pope tried to spare the person of the King. 'His Majesty,' said he, 'has been deceived. The fault is that of the ambassador, and he must suffer for it. He it is who, having accepted the new Nuncio, changed his mind, embittered matters by his letters, and is the cause of the evil.' The Cardinal defended Pisany. 'To tell the truth to one's sovereign is not to do mischief; it is a praiseworthy act, not one deserving of censure; but not to do so, on the contrary, is a punishable act. Besides, were even an ambassador to have committed a grievous error, it must be his own sovereign who punishes him. Thus to treat ambassadors is to offend their sovereigns, and from such offences to powerful sovereigns irreparable inconveniences arise. The like occurs when they are not respected in the person of their representatives.' The Pope scarcely allowed the Cardinal to speak, but again attacked the ambassador; not the King, 'whom he likes, and will help if His Majesty decides upon waging war against the Huguenots. If, at the outset of his pontificate, he were to endure such insults, everyone would chide him and treat him as they had treated Pope Gregory. If the late Pope had not tolerated such proceedings, he, Sixtus the Fifth, would not have been so insolently treated.' Having exhausted every argument, the Cardinal betook himself to entreaties; but could only obtain that Pisany should remain at Tivoli, under the formal injunction not to enter Rome. Such a concession could not be accepted with dignity, and, on the advice of the Cardinal, the embassy left for Lucca, July 30, 1585, where it awaited the orders of its Government, which were not long coming, and which bade him return to France. Pisany was in despair. 'This,' he wrote to M. de Villeroy, 'is exceedingly vexatious to me, and if I were at all in fault, I should have died of grief, believing myself to be the most unfortunate man in existence to have brought that mission to that unlucky end, albeit leaving the whole in the hands and to the judgment of God.'

The endeavours of the Cardinal Protector of France had been fruitless. The Cardinal trembled at the notion that the Pope would bring the matter before the Consistory. He feared that its approval of the dismissal of the ambassador, or even the silence of the Assembly, would make the evil worse. Nothing of this occurred, however, whether because Sixtus V. listened to the entreaties of many members of the Sacred College, who implored him not to embitter the quarrel, or whether he acted of his own accord.

The Cardinal, angry at having gone too far, and obliged to advise the King, was in a cruel state of perplexity. No one knew better than he did how deplorable was the state of Henry III.'s affairs; no one better knew his character, or the danger there was to Catholicism if he appealed to the Huguenots to combat the League, or to the latter to fight the Huguenots. It was either exposing France to the perils of heresy, or placing her at the mercy of Spain. In this dilemma D'Este advised prudence, which meant submission to the Pope's will. To this cruel extremity was this generally enlightened man reduced, because, wishing in Rome to neutralise the influence of Spain, he had got his sovereign into a pass from which he could not get out except by retreating. He advised prudence, but with infinite oratorical precautions, dexterously avoiding to wound the susceptibility or self-esteem of the King

‘He confides in the wisdom of his Very Christian Majesty, who with his habitual prudence will be able to judge how hard it is on the one hand to bear an insult, and on the other to break with the Pope at such a time, and will weigh these matters, keeping an eye on the state of his present affairs.’

Happily Sixtus V. was not desirous of breaking altogether with France. He had written a letter to the King, which had been taken by a confidential hand, to explain matters, while he maintained the dismissal of Pisany. In another letter he called Henry III. King of Christendom, of which flattering title D’Este knew how to take advantage with Henry. Meanwhile he showed himself disposed to help him, as regards church property, to the amount of two millions, hoping that such property would not be sold, but authorising the sale to that amount.

On the other hand the King resolved to be patient, but deeply felt the insult which had been offered to him. ‘My uncle,’ he wrote to the Cardinal on August 17, 1585, ‘I wish to open my heart to you on the subject of the insult offered to me in Rome, and must tell you that I am obliged, greatly to my regret, to dissemble rather more than I would wish, owing to the state in which my affairs are, and the declaration I have made against the Huguenots in my kingdom. I never would have believed that our Holy Father the Pope could have so forgotten himself as to insult me in the person of my ambassador.’ Matters went no further. Cardinal d’Este succeeded in calming the irritation of the two sovereigns, both of whom considered themselves outraged, and were both desirous to make it up—the King because he was compelled to seek for support everywhere, and the Pope because he correctly guessed how matters were with the King, whose weakness filled him with fear. He did not object to profit by such weakness, but he was afraid that the Huguenots would derive a greater advantage from it, or that it would even more benefit the King of Navarre, the enemies of Catholicism, or those who, like the King of Spain and the Guises, defended religion on political grounds. To do this was contrary to his instincts rather than his views, which were not altogether settled. Under such circumstances a reconciliation was possible. Cardinal d'Este worked at it incessantly. After parleying for several months, it was agreed that the Archbishop of Nazareth should be received in Paris, and that M. de Pisany should return as ambassador to Rome. The Pope insisted, however, on the Duke of Luxemburg, who had been sent to make the act of submission, being received before the ambassador.

This point of etiquette kept everything in suspense. So-called strong-minded people, who are generally the reverse, despise and ridicule the dictates of etiquette, because they do not know that etiquette, with its numberless symbolical formulæ, is the safeguard of international rights, often obtained at the price of blood; that it maintains certain given positions; prevents any indirect return to matters which have been settled, and facilitates the daily intercourse between individuals and between States. Etiquette exists everywhere. Both great and small must submit to it. It is a necessary element of civilised life. Ridicule lies in its exaggeration. The Pope was not familiar with questions of protocols ; but his great common sense told him that if he allowed M. de Pisany to take precedence over the Duke of Luxemburg, it would be an apology from him to the King and the diplomatist whom he had treated so unceremoniously. The latter, who had been away for a time from his embassy, would be taking full possession of it by right, as if returning from leave. But if he came after M. de Luxemburg, then it was the latter who renewed relations, and M. de Pisany continued them after the Duke's departure.

Cardinal d'Este took much trouble to obtain the precedence for Pisany. He at last succeeded, owing to a stratagem, as well as to the Pope's ignorance of such matters. 'Unable,' he wrote to Villeroy, 'to conquer the Pope's objections by good and convincing reasoning, I had recourse to an argument which is not well founded. As he is not well versed on the subject, it served me better than the rest. I maintained that the act of submission could not be made by an ambassador-extraordinary without the ambassador-ordinary being present. He replied that I might present and assist the ambassador-extraordinary ; but I replied that, as a cardinal, I must be in my place, and that such a thing had never occurred.' Things which have never been done being impossible in Rome, the Holy Father at last agreed that he would receive M. de Pisany before M. de Luxemburg.

Another question relative to etiquette had caused the Cardinal many a sleepless night, so zealous was he in the defence of the honour and very weak prestige of his royal cousin.

The Pope had received at dinner, besides Count Olivarès, the Duke of Frias, who had been sent to Rome by Philip II. to make act of submission. On the Cardinal asking the same favour for the French ambassador, he was met by objections. 'Dinner,' it was said, 'was given accidentally to the Spaniards, and owing to the rain which was falling heavily.' At last the dinner was also granted to the French; and thus the Cardinal, who had committed the great blunder of setting the two Courts at variance, had the feeble merit of reconciling them, both availing themselves with pleasure of the opportunity, provided their susceptibilities were not offended. M. de Pisany and the Duke of Luxemburg, who had orders to await at Bologna the summons of Cardinal d'Este, and not to proceed unless it was settled that Pisany was to be received first, arrived at the villa of Pope Julius, and was received by young Michel Peretti, whom the Holy Father had sent to meet them. They then made their solemn entry, 'with a deal of firing from Fort St. Angelo,' at the very time that the whole town was assisting at the transfer of the Obelisk to the Piazza of St. Peter. Conducted to the Sala Reggia, Sixtus V. admitted them to the ceremony of kissing feet, received the King's letters from their own hands, and invited them to his table, being 'exceedingly attentive to them during the whole of dinner.' When the repast was over he kept them half an hour more, saying 'that he was exceedingly sorry for the troubles in France, blaming those who caused them, even unto nearly breaking the good intelligence which existed between them.' Cardinal d'Este, who was ill with fever, could not assist at the act of reconciliation. On the morrow M. de Pisany was the first to be received in private audience, and resumed his functions. He had become prudent almost against his will, and could scarcely contain his ardent nature when dealing with that terrible old man, who could get into such a passion, but also forget heartily, which is rarely the case, the blows he had himself inflicted. This second embassy, as the reader will see, was, for much graver motives, to end as abruptly as the first. Meanwhile M. de Pisany had become the advocate of good relations, and the fear with which Sixtus inspired him sometimes appears in his correspondence. Giving an account, some time later, of the Pope's illness, he wrote to M. de Villeroy, 'He does all he can for himself and will not surrender, but eats stoutly his wine soup daily, and will not give it up for anybody. I am quite sure that on the sly our French cardinals are preparing; but we must take care that this does not come to his ear, for he never would forgive it, and, if he suspected me, he would be for throwing me out of the window.'

The Archbishop of Nazareth, who was the innocent cause of all these quarrels, was but a short time Nuncio in Paris. He died the following year, 1587, universally regretted. The news of his death distressed both the people and the political world of Rome. Henry III. had conceived a great liking for him, and had a magnificent funeral ordered. During thirty-nine years' service in the highest posts, he had always shown the example of voluntary poverty. Sufficient money was not found in his house wherewith to pay the expenses of his burial or to send home his servants.

The Very Christian King had not alone felt the severity of the new Pontiff. The Catholic King was not better treated in the person of his highest subjects. The Duke of Terranuova, who was the Governor of Milan, had caused a seat to be raised for his own use in the cathedral of the town, as high as that of the archbishop. The Pope ordered the seat to be pulled down by force, threatening the Governor at the same time with excommunication if he resisted. It was with great difficulty that the Spanish cardinals obtained that the affair should be handed over to the Congregation of the Bishops.

During a season of famine the Viceroy of Naples had prohibited the exportation of corn grown on Neapolitan soil, but belonging to inhabitants of Beneventum, within the Pontifical limits. Informed of the fact, the Pope at once complained to Olivarès, and declared that, unless the prohibition were removed within a given time, which he fixed himself, the Viceroy would be excommunicated. The latter prevented the storm by hastening to obey the summons of the impetuous Pontiff.¹

When he had told him that the Viceroy, from fear of being excommunicated, had announced his submission by a special messenger, Priuli adds: 'Ognuno procura di proceder con gran rispetto vedendosi tanto risoluta Sua Santità in farsi portar rispetto, ch' ognuno dubita, che anco per cose legieri si possa incorrer in disordine d'im-

With the exception of diplomatic quarrels between Rome and Florence with respect to Malatesta, almost all the facts we have narrated took place nearly at the same time, three or four months after the election of the Pope. While Rome was subject to the first effects of the severity of the new régime, which were intended to give her security in the future, but which terrified before reassuring her, the almost forgotten murder of Francesco Peretti was brought back to the recollection of the public by the arrest, for common misdemeanour, of a former servant of Duke Bracciano. This individual, who was put to the rack, made certain confessions which greatly compromised the Duke. Donna Camilla, who had never ceased to mourn over the death of her son and to ask that the culprit might be brought to justice, availed herself of this circumstance to urge her brother again to try and obtain the extradition of Paolo Giordano Orsini, who was then living at Salò, on the Lake of Garda, upon Venetian territory. Sixtus V. spoke of it to the Venetian envoys. He confessed how he disliked recurring to this affair, having as a cardinal placed the matter in the hands of God; but, as he was called upon to administer justice severely, he could not allow an atrocious crime to be committed without punishment. On the other hand, he entertained a great repugnance to appear as if he were satisfying a personal revenge. He had caused the papers to be brought to him which related to the murder, and which had been deposited in Fort St. Angelo. When he saw them he burst into tears, and said he would neither know nor hear anything. Finally, giving way to the prayers of his sister, he insinuated that Marcello Accoramboni, the principal culprit next to Paolo Giordano, the news of whose death had just been received, should be tried, not for the murder of Francesco, but for a homicide committed in a public bath at Padua. The Senate refused absolutely. Marcello was brought before the tribunals, whose answer was, 'We cannot reconsider a case that has been judged. The concordat which has been agreed to between us only refers to individuals expelled by Sixtus not being allowed to enter Venetian territory, and does not, therefore, affect Marcello, since he was exiled under Gregory. In this case, however, and to mark its respect for the Holy Father, the Senate is prepared to make an exception. Marcello will be arrested, brought before the Council of Ten, sent to the prison of Padua, thence to be handed over, at the Pope's request, to the Pontifical authorities.' After much hesitation Sixtus V. accepted this offer. Marcello was taken to Ancona, his trial was revised, and himself condemned to death, in November 1586.

Meanwhile, Duke Bracciano, who for some time past had been suffering from a wound in the leg, died at Salò,¹ in the arms of his wife, whom he adored to the last, and whom he constituted heiress to the greater part of his fortune. The news of his death produced a painful sensation in Rome, where the great noblemen of the land are well considered if they can wear their titles with honour, and are dear to the people, who share the glory that attaches to their name.¹ The faults which had tarnished his life were forgotten, but the liberality and amiable character of Signor Paolo Giordano were recollected. In Madrid also, many persons, and among them Cardinal Granvella, regretted him.² He had left Vittoria alone at Salò, exposed to the jealousy of the Orsini, and especially of Ludovico, then at Venice, and on the point of starting to take the command of the island of Corfu. Informed by a letter from the young widow, Ludovico arrived at once; treated her most shamefully, and obliged her, which she did with gentleness and resignation, to give him all the jewellery and precious objects which were in the house. Alarmed, and foreseeing what her fate would be, she fled to Padua, claimed the protection of Venice, and, being reduced almost to poverty, wrote to the uncle of her first husband to ask for help. Sixtus, who was much moved, and had always had a weakness for her, had not time to answer her request. He soon learnt her tragic end. During the night of December 21 and 22, some twenty men, armed and masked, scaled the walls of the Cavalli Palace, which she inhabited with her brothers Marcello and Flaminio and a few attendants. Another band of masked men surrounded the house. The murderers entered the room of Flaminio, wounded him first, then pursued him into the next room, where he had fled, and finished him off with their swords and arquebuses. Vittoria had been to communion in the morning. She was saying her evening prayer when the assassins appeared at the threshold of her room. When she saw them she did not ask that her life might be spared, but prayed for a few moments only to collect herself, and recommend her soul to God. The ruffians refused, and killed her with their daggers. Her brother Marcello had fled. The assassins, after looking for him all over the house and even on the roof, left, and recommended the servants to take care of the effects belonging to the victim. On hearing of this crime, the Senate sent to Padua an 'avogador' of the communes, who had orders to search for the murderers, in concert with the rectors of the town, and to apprehend them. As the most serious suspicions were entertained as regards Ludovico Orsini, the commissioner of the Republic had instructions to seize him, even by force if necessary. On the following morning Orsini, who had been cited to appear before the rectors, instead of obeying, fortified himself in the Contarini Palace, outside the town, on the other bank of the Brenta, near the convent of St. Austin. Here shots were fired, and there were dead and wounded on both sides. At last the 'avogador' brought up two guns, which soon brought down an angle of the palace, burying in the fall three of the principal culprits, Count Francesco Montemolino, Col. Lorenzo dei Nobili di Fermo, and Oliverotta Paulucci. Orsini, who had hoped to prolong his resistance until the evening, when he could have escaped during the night, saw that resistance was useless, and gave himself up as a prisoner. He sent his ring to his followers, thirty-three armed men, and recommended that they should give themselves up too. The house was then occupied and searched. Some of the banditti were taken, and, among bloodstained daggers and arquebuses, a silver tank with the arms of Medici was found, which had belonged to Donna Isabella of Tuscany, and afterwards to Vittoria Accoramboni. Both these women had been murdered by Orsinis, the one by her husband, the other by the near relative of the latter. This cup served as evidence in the summary trial which Ludovico underwent. The Doge requested Priuli to communicate the preceding details to Sixtus V., and to inform him that, to satisfy public justice and dignity, both of which had been outraged by a functionary of the State in one of the first towns and fortified places of the Republic, it had been decided that he should lose his life, albeit with all the regard due to his illustrious family, many members of which had rendered good service to the State. Three days after his capture, Ludovico was strangled in the prison of the Government palace, and his accomplices were executed the next day, without ceremony, on the public place of Padua.

The Pope praised the energy with which the Republic had gone to work on this occasion. He complimented the Venetian ambassador, adding, however, 'I hope that in future the Republic will be careful not to admit into its pay men of such bad repute. It will have no lack of good subjects as long as it remains in good intelligence with the Lord God, who sends to good princes legions of angels, and one angel alone can do more than all the men together.' In Rome the numerous friends of Ludovico Orsini regretted his death.

Thus ended the tragedy, as it was called, of Vittoria Accoramboni, the most captivating woman, according to contemporary writers, that Italy had ever produced. Was she criminal? Was she innocent? It is not our province to judge. We are writing the life of Sixtus the Fifth, and not that of the beautiful and unfortunate wife of his nephew. We must leave to the lawyers who from generation to generation examine her case the painful task of deciding as to her guilt, or to poets the sympathetic care of renewing the flowers round her tomb. For ourselves we will not throw a stone at that strange beauty who with her favours spread death around her, who herself was killed by those who hated her because she was too much loved, redeeming by her Christian and heroic death the scandals of her romantic existence. She was ever amiable and ever loved, even loving, for 'love spares not those who inspire it.'¹ This tragedy is but one of the numerous examples, though a remarkable one, of what men dared do in Italy at that time. It shows the evil in relief, the danger which civilisation ran of falling into barbarism and of perishing in bloodshed, as well as the urgency which existed of finding a remedy. Salvation could come only out of extreme measures, called for by the state of things, which was itself extreme, not to say desperate.

We have seen that Sixtus V. did not hesitate to undertake this arduous task. To re-establish the authority of the law, so as to give security to Rome, to her States, and indirectly to Italy, he had to display an incredible degree of energy, to have recourse to measures of terrible, even cruel, severity; but he had only punished the guilty—at least those who were so according to the law. In punishing the enemies of society, he hoped to win the sympathy and the gratitude of the peaceful citizens. The results which he obtained in a few months were surprising. In April he had ascended the throne. We have shown in what state the Papal dominions were at that time. In August matters had already taken another turn. Two years later they were altogether changed. Order reigned in the capital and in the other towns. The country was free from the scourge of banditti. These had been either killed or dispersed.

For the first time for many years people breathed freely. They were not alternately ransomed by the disturbers of peace and those who were sent to restore it. Sixtus had also on that account become the idol of the peasantry, though he was the bugbear of Rome. With his marvellous insight he had at once ascertained the seat of the evil.

He understood that order in Rome was possible only if the barons could no longer depend upon the help of the banditti around the city, and that these could only be exterminated when the barons ceased to receive them in their country houses, or the reigning princes of Italy upon their territory. It would have been useless, and a waste of strength as well as increasing the evil, to enter on a campaign against the brigands without previously conquering the opposition of the aristocracy—without bringing the Italian Governments not only to withdraw their protection, but even to join their efforts to his in the suppression of brigandage.

The aristocracy must submit; those among them who resisted, and were the most important, must be made examples of, while the Italian princes must be compelled to co-operate in the war of extermination which he contemplated. Such an undertaking supposed not only an intimate understanding between his Government and theirs, but also good relations between them. Two campaigns at the same time were therefore to be opened—the one against the opposition which his authority met with in Rome, the other against the brigands, who at that time were masters of his own States. Besides these two campaigns, he had to carry on a third—a diplomatic one—the object of which was to obtain the co-operation of the Italian Governments, of the Republic of Venice, of the Grand-Duchy of Tuscany, and of the King of Spain as King of Naples and Duke of Milan. In order that such co-operation might be of use, it was necessary that good harmony should exist between Venice and Rome, and that harmony had long been broken.

Such was his programme. The reader has seen how he set to work to accomplish it. The banditti were exterminated without mercy. The aristocracy was warned by the execution of Pepoli that any opposition might be fatal; so was the Sacred College, by the treatment to which the Cardinal Cameriere and others were subjected; the King of Spain by the declared impending excommunication of his highest representatives in Italy; the King of France by the dismissal of his ambassador. There arose hatreds which were kept down, and recriminations to which no vent was given; but all submitted, and the murmurs of those who had suffered were drowned in the applause with which the whole of Europe greeted him. Europe applauded, as men always applaud, the spectacle of force employed successfully, and within legal limits, in the service of society. The natural enemies of the Pope—the chiefs of the Protestant Reformation—were among his greatest admirers. Henry of Navarre was one, and Queen Elizabeth, on being solicited by her ministers to choose a husband, was wont to reply with a smile, ‘I know of but one man who is worthy of my hand, and that man is Sixtus V.’

PART THE FOURTH.

CHAPTER I.

THE 'MONTI.'

'SEVERITY and accumulation of riches'—such were, according to Sixtus V., the indispensable elements of a good Government; and by severity he meant public order, and by riches order in the finances. Thanks to such a system he had restored in his States, not only the respect for the law, but also his temporal authority. With the help of the millions which he accumulated, he soon became one of the richest princes in Europe, if it be true that he is the richest who, better than any other, can at any time dispose of the money which is required by the exigencies of the moment, or to accomplish his purposes. It is certain that if the immense territories of Philip II. be compared with the insignificant dimensions of the States of the Church, the King of Spain was, as Sixtus V. was wont to say, an elephant, and he himself a fly. But Philip's coffers were always empty, while those of the Pope were always full. Whenever the galleons, loaded with all the treasures of the new world, delayed their arrival at Seville, Madrid was at bay, while the Pope was separated from his fortune only by the short distance which divides the Vatican from the Mole of Hadrian. The Emperor, the Archdukes, Henry III. were always in a chronic state of want of money; and, excepting the Republic of St. Mark, all the princes of Italy were very much less well off than the Roman sovereign. With a few millions of gold in hand, Sixtus V. was the richest sovereign of the day: not that he had many more resources than the others, for, on the contrary, he had less; but he had more ready money whenever he required it, and always more than enough at any time. So situated, a man becomes a privileged being, to whom the imagination of the people lends a power which partakes of the supernatural, and before which everyone bows his head, either through envy or vague hopes, but generally because of that magic and indescribable charm which the aspect of gold produces, as well as because we are ready to bear with the prestige of power, and to be intoxicated by its influence. Sixtus V. knew this, and used loudly to proclaim that 'a king without money is nobody.' When speaking to diplomatists, to cardinals, or foreigners, he was fond of referring to his riches. In doing this there was a political object as well as a personal gratification. He wished it to be known that he was rich, and intended to remain such—that he meant to increase his wealth, and especially not to jeopardise it by an imprudent expenditure. He would have squandered his riches, and with them his power, had he, as he was suspected at one time, conceived any ambitious plans such as those for which Pope Caraffa had so dearly paid, or in subsidising Catholic princes who, in his mind, were not equal to their mission. Whenever he promised a subsidy, it was always with the understanding that the sums granted should only be discharged under certain circumstances, and after certain results obtained. If there was no success, he closed the credit account. For him to give money, there must be some accomplished fact. Thus he acted with the King of Spain on the occasion of his armaments against England, and with the Duke of Savoy, when, through the opposition of France, that prince was obliged to defer his attack upon Geneva. He used to say so to the Cardinal de Joyeuse, whenever he importuned him with requests in favour of Henry III., for whom Sixtus V. entertained simply a feeling of pity. The letters of the French cardinal are filled with reports of his audiences in which the Pope was lavish of good advice, but took care never to give money, which would pass into the hands of the King's favourites. 'Whereupon,' writes the Cardinal,¹ 'he again talked of his money, saying he had money and wished everyone to know it; that many who witnessed his accumulation of it said that he entertained some great design, or wished to wage war; the truth being that he wished to go to war with no one, unless obliged; that the money he collected was to help the Christian princes, and especially your Majesty; but that he would think much before lending you any, and that the project for which the money had been asked by your Majesty must be in good progress.' On another occasion the Cardinal and Marquis de Pisany attended the Pope's audience, together with a financial man sent by the King. It was again a question of asking for help. Sixtus treated them very ill. 'The Pope,' wrote Joyeuse,¹ 'made an answer which was very unworthy of his Holiness, of your Majesty, and of the importance of the affair in transaction, and I am very glad that another, and not I, has to communicate it to you. The more we argued, the more he replied unsatisfactorily, so that we had to change the subject, in order not to leave him in so bad a way and go off ourselves in anger, for which he gave us many opportunities. The cause of so strange a reply was the request which Signor Mario and I made for money (which, owing to his closeness, he is disinclined to part with), reminding him that he had promised to help your Majesty as soon as he should note some success. In fine, sire, so it is, and I beg most humbly that your Majesty will no longer depend upon it. For while I do not believe that he will ever give you monetary help, I think, also, that as long as he believes that your Majesty is likely to need it from him, he will speak too unworthily of your affairs; whereas, if liberated from the fear that he may be asked for money, he might change the tone of his language, and allow that it is daylight at twelve.'

'The best thing to do with the Pope,' writes Pisany²

to Villeroy, 'is to take care that if he does no good to the King, he does him no harm, neither of which he will do if it costs him any money ; but if one or other alternative must be expected, it would rather be that of doing harm, for such is his personal inclination.'

The financial system of Sixtus V. rested upon the increase in the revenues corresponding to a decrease in the expenses, which will ever be the only means of giving a solid basis to the finances of a State. The economies thus made, however, were shut up in Fort St. Angelo, and were dead capital, depriving currency, and therefore the public wealth, commerce, and industry, of the specie which it required. In looking at this proceeding with the eyes of the present day, we cannot but smile at the ingenuousness of a régime which, in our mind, is prejudicial to the vital interests of the country, which it impoverishes, while it fills the public treasury. The interests of the Government and those of the country are the same, and one cannot prosper while the other is suffering. Matters are very different, however, when looked at with the eyes of that epoch. People were very ignorant about finances. It was not yet known that the national wealth increases in proportion with the currency, which creates demand, awakens and keeps up public elasticity, and, when maintained within certain limits, benefits the whole population. But currency implies credit, and credit scarcely existed. Money was only lent at very high interest, and never during political troubles, that is, at the very time when Governments are most in want of it. There were only two public banks in Europe, those of Venice and Genoa, but they opened no credit accounts. Their business was confined to facilitating on the spot the commercial transactions of such tradesmen as had deposited money with them. Hence the necessity for Governments to have a treasury composed of specie, just as it was necessary to have granaries full of corn in the event of a famine. There being no means of transport, neither England, nor Italy, nor France could have asked Russia or America for the grain of which a bad harvest left them in need. Before the arrival of the corn, people would have starved. In a financial point of view, therefore, to accumulate money was good policy. It was, in fact, the only one possible; and if Sixtus V. was criticised in his day, it was not because he economised and deposited the fruits of his economy in Fort St. Angelo. What he was reproached with was, that he carried the system rather too far, that he taxed the people rather too heavily, and that he went too rapidly to work. When, at the end of the year, the Government collected the sums due to the Apostolic Chamber, he was accused of keeping back specie, and thus producing temporary disturbances in the daily transactions of ordinary commerce.¹

Rome was never a commercial city nor an industrial centre. From the latter half of the sixteenth century, the Genoese had the monopoly of the commerce of the Pontifical States. They were the best bankers in the world. The Venetians had ceased to be the first navigators. They had been replaced by the Portuguese and the Spaniards, who were themselves on the eve of being supplanted by the English and the Dutch ; but they were still for Italy the first commercial people, and had the monopoly of the commerce of the Levant. With his usual sagacity Sixtus V. turned to account the advantages to be derived from such a state of things. He took advantage of the Genoese, who were desirous of buying up his 'Monti,' of which we will speak presently, and obtained for his Adriatic provinces, especially for Ancona, which he had made a free port, all the advantages to be derived from his intimacy with the Republic. As to the Romans he knew them well. He gave up the idea of making bankers of them, or great merchants. He knew them to be clever men, but he knew also that, with the exception of the artists and workmen who were connected with the arts, they preferred to move their tongues rather than their arms, and found ample elements of prosperity in being able to plunder foreigners. In the Middle Ages, and until the brigands had put an end to the possibility of carrying on these branches of industry, silk stuffs were manufactured in the Marches, and woollen in other parts of the province. By issuing wise ordinances, and giving intelligent aid, the Pope revived these industries. Understanding how important it is to have good roads of communication, he built bridges and constructed roads. Gregory XIII. had already connected Rome and Ancona by a road on which small chariots, and even carriages, often drawn by bullocks, could travel. His successor gave proof of that originality which was his characteristic, and of that authority especially which, by a look or a word, settled all difficulties of time, place, and ill-will. A great political sense reigns in all his acts for improving the position of the people, and maintaining the public interests. He protected the Jews, in order the better to take advantage of them. These were already numerous in Rome, and, though living at the Borghetto, were already known to be very rich. They, however, laboured under severe restrictions, which dated from the Middle Ages. The Pope granted them certain facilities, and protected them against the outrages to which they were subject whenever they came out of their quarter. Rome often witnessed with astonishment Christians whipped publicly in the Corso for having insulted a Jew. The Jews, on this account, were among his most devoted subjects. On a certain Wednesday, at the fair of the Piazza Navone,¹ the news of his death having been falsely rumoured, the Jews, terror-stricken, all fled, carrying away their goods with them.

In every respect Sixtus V. went with, or rather in advance of, his century. He aimed but at one object, which was always to have ready money in hand, and never to spend it except upon profitable undertakings, and through persons who inspired him with confidence.

For this purpose he gave a great development to the system of offices called 'vacabile' and 'non vacabile,' as well as to the 'Monti;' in other words, to the purchase of office and the placing out of private capital at an interest varying between 5 and 10 per cent., according to the nature of the Monti (State funds), which, like the offices, were 'vacabile' or 'non vacabile.'

The 'vacabile' offices were divided into three classes : first the 'prelate's office or office of the first order.' The purchaser, besides paying the price of the office, had to give personal guarantees that he had the necessary requirements, standing and antecedent. Next came the minor offices, or those of the second order, which equally belonged to the category of public employment, but to purchase which it was not necessary to be a prelate, and which could be held in common with a third, or entirely given up to the latter, if the holder was wanting in the necessary qualities. Finally, there were the offices of the third order, which did not give access to public employment. The holders derived an annual income from certain taxes specially devoted to this purpose. The revenue of the 'vacabile' offices of the two first categories consisted in the taxes and profits which the holders, according to the nature of their employment, were allowed to derive from the services they rendered to those who were obliged to have recourse to their aid. The office became vacant at the death of the holder, and was again put to auction by the 'dateria,' who lodged in the Pope's treasury the amount paid, without allowing any indemnity to the heirs. It was therefore capital placed at a mere life interest, supposing that these public posts were only given to individuals capable of holding them, that those who could not administer to them themselves only gave them up to the worthiest, and that in levying the tax the letter of the law was strictly adhered to. The system then, as looked upon in the light of that day, may be perfectly justified in principle.¹ It is, however, evident that it gave rise to bribery and every species of corruption. To prevent abuse, it was necessary that there should be a strong, severe, and intelligent chief, in fact a Sixtus V. As soon as such a control as his should fail, the system must become a cause of demoralisation, and to the public an intolerable vexation. That is not all. To multiply the vacancies, Sixtus V. had issued an ordinance by which the offices at 'Monti' were vacant by the promotion of the holders to bishoprics or cardinalships.¹ This was giving a pontiff, who would be less penetrated with the sanctity of his mission, the means of filling his coffers by naming prelates to the vacant bishoprics who had just purchased Monti or 'vacabile' offices. It was putting indirectly a price upon the highest posts of the hierarchy. The rich Genoese (most of their great families were in commerce) arrived in great numbers to place their money in the Monti, thus hoping to make rapid progress in the ecclesiastical line, and to see the doors of the Sacred College open to them.

The 'Monti' constituted the public debt. The creditors were purchasers of shares, which were called 'luoghi.' There were 'vacabile' Monti, that is, shares which were redeemable or to be paid off at a certain time; and 'non vacabile' Monti, that is, perpetual.

This institution was due to Clement VII., who at the time of the sack of Rome was in want of money wherewith to pay Charles V. his subsidy during the war, which the latter was waging against the Sultan. The venal offices likewise existed before the time of

Sixtus V., but he reformed and extended the sphere of both by cutting short the numerous abuses which had crept in, and which were justly complained of. While they enriched the holders of shares, they injured the public as well as the Treasury.

Notary acts, until then kept in the hands of the solicitors, to the prejudice of individuals, were collected into a group of general archives of the Pontifical States, and thus made accessible, by paying a trifle, to those who were interested in searching them. This was providing for a want which was much felt. The public profited by it. The Pope wished the Treasury to gain by it also. He farmed out the archives for nine years to a Roman patrician of the name of Paolo Falconieri, who was to give him 11,000 scudi annually for it. At the same time he instituted the 'Archives Fund,' which consisted of 98 luoghi, at 100 scudi each luogo. The purchasers paid 98,000 scudi to the State, and each share brought them in 10 scudi, so that their money was placed at ten per cent. interest, paid out of the money due by Falconieri.¹

The Pope based his financial operation upon a public necessity, which he satisfied by means of compensation. This compensation allowed Falconieri to furnish the Government, besides the profit which he derived himself from the excess of his returns, with the means of paying the interest upon the sums advanced. The security of the money so placed lay in the permanent want which the public would experience of having recourse to the archives, which the Pope held in his own hands, and which he intended at the end of nine years either to farm out again to the same people, or, what was more probable, on better terms.

The building of the Sixtus Bridge, of the cupola of St. Peter, and the subsidies granted to Philip II. for his armament against England, obliged him to have recourse to another financial operation. He instituted the 'Vacabile Monte of St. Bonaventura.' The capital, which had previously been fixed at 300,000 scudi, was afterwards raised to 400,000. There were 4,000 luoghi or shares, at 100 scudi, yielding ten per cent. interest. A portion of the Custom House returns was set aside to pay off the interest, as well as of the Pontifical postal service, and an increase in the stamp duty.

The 'non vacabile' Monti yielded but five per cent. In establishing the Monte Sixtus, which yielded a sum of 520,000 scudi to the Treasury, the Pope decreed that, in his dominion, Rome and Bologna being excepted, a tax should be levied on wine. He soon perceived, however, that this was a mistake. Duty on articles of first necessity (and wine is one in southern countries) can be heavily imposed without ruining the taxpayer only if that industry has reached a certain degree of development, if it works in concert with agriculture, if the cultivator has the opportunity and certainty of selling his products, and of thus procuring the money a portion of which is to pay the tax. Prosperity does not necessarily imply money; but it is injured when the people have no money. Such was the case, not only with the rural population of the States of the Church, but with the greater part of the inhabitants in Italy, especially in the south of the peninsula. The 'quattrino' levied on a 'foglietta' of wine was a death-blow. To pay it the workman was obliged to sell his implements, the peasant his cattle. Marforio asked Pasquino why he washed his linen on a Sunday? 'Because,' replied the latter, 'the sun will be put up to auction on Monday.' Marks of indignation broke out everywhere, and Sixtus hastened to suppress the tax.

When he looked back and compared the state of the provinces and city of Rome at the time of his accession with what they were at the end of his pontificate, Sixtus rejoiced greatly. On one occasion, a year before his death, he spoke at length on the subject to the Venetian envoy. After enumerating the buildings, bridges, and aqueducts which were completed, and the structures projected, he told Alberto Badoer how his finances stood.¹ 'At the time when I ascended the throne,' he said, 'the revenues of the Church were, it is true, two million gold scudi; but the debts of the State left, out of that amount, a sum of 200,000 scudi only at the disposal of the Treasury.'² Yesterday the returns of the accountants showed that there is a yearly economy of 146,000 scudi. This I obtained by reducing considerably the number of employments, and in providing with livings and other ecclesiastical preferments many of the clergy who had previously been living at the expense of the State. I have in the Fort some 3,000,000 scudi in gold, and 1,000,000 in silver, which, if the gold was converted into silver, would make a sum of 4,600,000 scudi, common money, or as many Venetian ducats.¹ I have 2,800,000 scudi in "vacabile Monti," which all turn, without counting the fortuitous vacancies in the space of ten years, as a long experience proves it, to the advantage of the Apostolic Chamber.'

If the Pope could flatter himself that his finances were flourishing, people were not all of the same opinion. According to the diplomatic correspondence of the times, his financial system was generally condemned. It is true that the ambassadors did not see with pleasure all the money which had been accumulated in Fort St. Angelo. They were ignorant of the account to which the Holy Father meant to turn it; they knew only how fruitless were their attempts to get at any of it when pressed by their sovereigns to do so. 'People find,' writes Giovanni Gritti,² 'that the Pope is wrong in over-taxing his subjects, and of confiding more in his coffers full of gold than in Providence or in the filial devotion of the Christian princes, who are ever ready to defend him against the oppressor; that so many treasures heaped up in Fort St. Angelo might excite the envy of the discontented, and raise in them the idea of attacking Rome.' The Pope used to smile whenever he heard such remarks. He knew what to expect from the disinterestedness and devotion of princes, and no longer feared the banditti, the chief of whom had either been beheaded at the bridge of St. Angelo, or compelled to leave Italy and take refuge with the Huguenots.¹ As to the designs of Providence, he said, it was not his intention to sound them; but he could not admit that in this respect diplomatists or the public generally were more clear-sighted than the Head of the Church. He maintained that kings and the Pope, when poor, would be objects of ridicule at a time when money opened the door to every undertaking; that his predecessors had committed a great error in not doing as he had done; and that sovereigns should follow the example of the ant, which puts away in summer the provisions for the winter.²

² To determine approximatively the value of silver at that time, it is only necessary to compare the prices of objects of primary necessity such as they were fixed then by the civil authorities of Rome under Sixtus V. and Clement VIII., with the prices of the same things now. It may safely be said that, with little variation, these prices remained the same during the last fifteen years of the sixteenth century. The ordinances of the years 1585 to 1593 show that a loaf of bread weighing 10 ounces cost 5 centimes; a pound of beef, a little more than 6 baiocchi, or 30 centimes; Parmesan and 'ricotte' cheese from 6 to 7 baiocchi; fresh butter 10, and during carnival time 12 baiocchi; vermicelli and macaroni, 3½ baiocchi. Wine in casks was sold at the 'Ripa'; those of Italy—the Clarivello, the Lachrima, the Ischia, and the Calabrese—cost between 2 and 2½ scudi, according to their quality; those of Greece from 3 to 5 scudi: muscat and malvoisie were the most in esteem, and also the dearest wines. The present prices in Rome are those of all the great capitals of Europe.

RELATIONS WITH THE COURTS OF SPAIN AND FRANCE.

THE world, and the diplomatic world especially, watched with curiosity, if not with anxiety, the Pope's financial transactions. It was asked what his intentions could be, and men could with difficulty believe that he seriously thought of undertaking, as he had often said he would, a war against the infidels. It was known besides that he was in personal correspondence with Philip II.¹

To Philip he had made his first proposals. He did not like Philip, nor was he liked by him. Of this he was aware, but he also knew that the King of Spain was the most powerful of the Catholic princes, the most ardent in the defence of the interests of the Church, which formed the constant and almost unique preoccupation of Sixtus. On this ground they met. He had scarcely been installed in the Vatican, when the Pope spoke to Olivarès, the Catholic King's ambassador, who inspired him with no more sympathy than did his master.

Juan Enrique de Gusman, Count of Olivarès, belonged to one of the great families of Spain, and had married

Doña Maria Pimentel de Fonseca. He was very rich;¹ had figured at the Court of Charles V., and possessed all the confidence of Philip. In his youth he had been a soldier. Lamed by a wound at St. Quentin, he availed himself of this infirmity as an excuse for not appearing at the ceremonies of St. Peter and of the Sistine Chapel, and thus deprived M. de Pisany of his anticipated pleasure of taking precedence over him. His arrival in Rome, which had been announced for some time, had taken place four years before the death of Gregory XIII., in June 1582. It was quite an event. Several vessels of the State escorted the ship which brought him and his numerous suite from Barcelona to Genoa and from Genoa to Civita Vecchia. He disembarked in the latter town with all the honours due to a representative of Spain, accepted the hospitality of Cardinal Farnese at Palo, and, after being admitted to a private, or, as it was then called, a secret audience of the Pope, he made his solemn entry with an extraordinary display of magnificence.

He had taken the palace of the Duke of Urbino² in the Corso. The good pensions which, in the name of his king, he distributed among cardinals, prelates, high and petty functionaries, gained him numerous adherents from the outset. Gregory's love for Spain secured for him the first place among the representatives of the great Courts. We may readily imagine that he was surrounded by deferential people, by flatterers as well as by secret enemies and Italian susceptibilities, while his proud attitude and cold disdain sufficed to break the resistance he might meet with. But we may conceive his anger and mortification when he found the new Pope stopping him short, threatening the Viceroy of Naples with excommunication, and making him feel that a similar fate might befall himself. The struggle was an unequal one. He soon found his unlimited authority roughly and suddenly brought back to narrower limits, more in harmony with the great notion which Sixtus entertained of the dignity of the Papacy. Full of the importance of his mission, and of the supremacy of his sovereign, Olivarès was a distinguished diplomatist. He had seen Europe, and knew Rome well; but at first he paid little attention to the monk-pope, who seemed as if he wished to play again the part of Innocent III., and was deceived because he despised him. This error is frequently committed by men who have grown old in the affairs of State when they find themselves suddenly in contact with new men whom they wrongly look upon as parvenus.

¹ Besides his revenues as an ambassador, he was said to have 40,000 scudi a year.

² The palace has been destroyed and replaced by the three Pamfili Palaces, now called the Doria Palace.

Until he knew him better, Olivarès smiled at the Pope's ignorance. He attributed to versatility of character the rich mine of ideas with which he was gifted, and which, though unripe as yet, even impracticable at times, but ever bold and profound, revealed the man who was rather in trouble as to which way to begin than as to the means of realising his views. Attacked openly, the ambassador tried, not only to defend himself, but to place himself on the offensive. Long supported by his sovereign, he was only abandoned by him when, passion having carried him beyond the limits of the respect due to the Head of the Church, he placed his king under the necessity of either breaking with Rome or of replacing his ambassador. Even then this disgrace was long coming, and in fact did not prove to be a disgrace. Sixtus V., who had several times urged his recall, had not the satisfaction of being rid of the presence of a man who poisoned his days. Olivarès outlived him in his post, and it was only after the death of the Pope that he exchanged his dignity of an ambassador for the Viceroyalty of Naples.

Magnificent in his way of living, spending much, just, severe, and terrible to the Neapolitan aristocracy, Olivarès made himself liked by the people as much as a Spanish viceroy could be liked. His compatriots looked upon him as one of the glories of their country, and, in memory of his long stay in Rome, called him the great 'papelista.' He disappeared from active life soon after the accession of Philip III., owing to some court intrigue.

His son, the celebrated count-duke who in the following century was to be for some time absolute master of the Spanish monarchy, was born in Rome, at the Urbino Palace, and was baptized, as were the numerous other children of Olivarès, in the church of Santa Maria in Via Lata. The splendid career of the favourite of Philip IV. has made people forget the more substantial merit of the father.¹

Sixtus V. and Olivarès could not agree. From the first conversations they had together, an antagonism was born between them. The first year they each tried to hide it, but later it broke out publicly.

The affairs of France, in the mind of the Pope, presented the distressing spectacle of an inextricable confusion. The sympathies of Rome were for Henry III., as legitimate king. Henry of Navarre, the chief of the Huguenots, was excommunicated for being a heretic. But Henry III., who was weak in mind and in character, often showed most equivocal tendencies, and frequently hinted in his correspondence with Rome the possibility of his going over to the camp of the heretics.¹ Henry of Bourbon, who was active and brave, gave hopes, on the contrary, of some day returning to Catholicism. If Henry III. were to be worsted in the fight against 'the Béarnais,' the schism of France would be an accomplished fact. If, on the other hand, the latter could be brought to renounce Protestantism, and as a Catholic were to succeed Henry III., the unity of faith and of the kingdom of France would be saved.

Political considerations complicated those of religion. The Guises defended the latter. Alone they had little chance of success, and required the co-operation of the King of Spain, who, undoubtedly a very zealous defender of the faith, perhaps even more zealous in this respect than they were, was at the same time quite resolved to have his services paid for at the expense of France, in which prize he would claim the lion's share. The victory on the part of the League, which was only possible with the help of Philip II., implied the dismemberment of France, and if not a dismemberment, that is, not a complete victory, no more did it imply a total collapse of the Catholic faith. There were always heretics whom, in the eyes of the Pope, it was necessary to do away with. If the victory should be complete, there would no longer be any France, but then, also, there would be no more heresy. Anything was better than heresy; but if heresy could be exterminated without sacrificing France, or rather without putting Spain in its place, which, thus aggrandised, might threaten Italy and Rome, it would be certainly the best solution. In fact, at the accession of Sixtus V., these difficulties appeared to be insurmountable.

¹ Complaining of the support given to the League by Gregory XIII., he wrote to Cardinal d'Este:—'His Holiness would seem to wish to force me to make use of sovereigns of opposite belief to ours, and to have recourse to extreme and desperate measures to revenge myself of the injury done to me, against what I had believed, and like that inflicted on other princes, the consequence of which was known too late, and when it could not be remedied.' 1585.

He returned to the illusions of his monkish life. War against the infidels (since he could not yet wage it against the heretics), the conquest of Algiers, the conversion of Queen Elizabeth, were the ideas on which he dwelt. When Olivarès presented himself one Saturday for his weekly audience, the Pope communicated these ideas to him, begging of him to write¹ in that sense to the King, and lay before him all the advantages of a war against Barbary, as the only means of pacifying the Mediterranean. The ambassador excused himself, and said that his master would probably reply to such proposals only if they came direct from His Holiness. The Holy Father then talked about England, and confided to Olivarès, without explaining his meaning, that there were some hopes of the Queen performing a 'good act' (embracing Catholicism). Olivarès inquired and found that these hopes were built upon a word said by the English ambassador in Paris to the Nuncio. He had said that, in the event of any disturbances, Her Majesty would have but to hear a mass to get out of trouble. The truth is, however, that the Jesuits had written from London to say that the Queen was favourably disposed; and it was on the strength of these informations that Sixtus V., through the Duke of Luxemburg, had begged Henry III. to enter into secret communications with Elizabeth.¹ 'In fine,' says the Count, in his first reports, 'the Pope wishes to undertake something great.' 'It would seem,' remarks Philip in the margin of his ambassador's letters, 'that the war in Flanders does not appear to him a great undertaking, nor that he knows what it costs. He is deceived about England, and labours under a delusion.' As may be seen, neither the King nor his envoy, as yet, took him for anything remarkable in the way of a politician.

Gregory XIII. had already entertained relations with Persia. But communications were slow, news contradictory, and the notion of combining an action in common with the 'sofi' was not very practicable, even supposing that the Christian princes had agreed (which they were far from doing) to attempt another crusade. An agent sent by Gregory to Persia came back towards the end of the pontificate of Sixtus V. The Shah's letter which he brought was three years old. Yet, at the outset of his reign, the Pope depended a good deal upon the results of his good relations with this 'infidel' ally. He expected to begin the war by attacking Barbary. It was observed to him that to take Tripoli, twenty-five or thirty galleys, at least, would be necessary, carrying among them an army of six thousand men; that they must disembark during the night, and re-embark at once if the surprise should fail. As for Algiers, the expedition would have to be carried out on a much larger scale. The latter undertaking, which the Pope was constantly recommending at Madrid, was particularly odious to Philip, who, seeing the attitude of England, was, on the contrary, endeavouring to be on good terms with Turkey. He finished by declaring that he would not hear Algiers spoken of further.¹

Some time after, Olivarès learnt that Cardinal d'Este was endeavouring to induce the Holy Father to engage in an enterprise against England. The Pope was to invite the King and Catholic princes of France, whom the treaty of Nemours, which they had just concluded, had reconciled, to march jointly against England for the purpose of re-establishing the Catholic religion in that country, of dethroning Elizabeth, and of setting Mary Stuart's son, the King of Scotland, on the English throne. Sixtus asked the opinion of the Cardinals de Vaudemont and de Sens. This was tantamount to telling the secret to Olivarès himself. The latter at once proceeded to the palace, declared to the Holy Father that such chimerical notions were out of season as long as heresy existed in France, and that Cardinal d'Este had only suggested them in order to sow discord between His Holiness and the Catholic French princes. How could he hope that the latter would follow out his wishes in this respect? how ask them to leave France at such a time? Would it not be leaving France in the power of the heretics, who, once masters of the country, would not fail to take the part of Elizabeth? The wars in France and in Flanders must first be concluded. Then England might be thought of, Queen Elizabeth expelled, and the kingdom given, not to the King of Scotland, who was not very zealous in the Catholic cause, but to Mary Stuart, his mother. The Pope acknowledged the truth of these remarks. He was mortified, besides, to learn that his intimate conversation with cardinals should come to the ear of the Spanish ambassador.¹ Warned by the latter that Henry III. was in treaty with the Sultan, Sixtus V. promised him that he would tell the French ambassador that if the King of France asked help of the Sultan, he would excommunicate him, deprive him of his kingdom, and would invite all the Christian princes to invade France, besides absolving his subjects from their allegiance to him. He spoke with such emphasis that Olivarès, who was delighted, could not doubt that the Pope was sincere.

As Sixtus got better acquainted with the important transactions of the day, he gained more authority in Madrid. He often wrote to the King, and Olivarès had often to come back upon the question of England. For various reasons the state of that country then engrossed the attention of both Philip and Sixtus. Common views gave rise, at the same time in Madrid and in Rome, to the idea of an expedition against Elizabeth. The results of that expedition are known. They were a fearful military disaster, and a still greater political defeat; the consolidation of Elizabeth on her throne, and of Protestantism in England.

In the eyes of Philip II., the daily increasing ascendancy of Elizabeth, her relations with the King of Denmark, with the Protestants of Germany, and with the Turks, made her a formidable enemy. Sleep fled from the couch of the old and infirm king whenever, during the day, letters were brought to him from the new Continent. They were always full of the depredations of Drake, the terror of those distant lands, who often captured the galleons of the King of Spain, whose coffers, on the other hand, were always being emptied to defray the expenses of the war in Flanders, of the League, and of the repression of insurrection in Portugal.

To bring England back to the fold of the Catholic Church was the Pope's greatest desire. In England, as in France, matters were rather complicated. The cause of the conquered religion was represented by a charming woman, beautiful still, interesting by her present misfortunes, obliging men to forget the levity of her conduct in happier days, as well as the suspicions to which it gave rise, and surrounded by the halo of martyrdom which she was about to suffer. On the throne was a woman full of energy, audacious, indomitable, evidently equal to the task of definitely, or at least for centuries, separating the noble and lately so Catholic land of England from the communion of the Church.

Sixtus V. pitied Mary Stuart, but admired Elizabeth. To obtain his end of bringing England back to Catholicism, there were, in his opinion, two means—the conversion of the Queen or her dethronement. He undertook both at the same time. In London, through the Jesuits, who penetrated in disguise and at the peril of their lives, and in Paris through his Nuncio, he incessantly strove to bring about the reconciliation of the Queen with Rome. He was in hopes that she would listen to his voice. He adjured Henry III., who kept up good relations with his English neighbour, to interpose his good offices, and to represent to her how dangerous was her present position, how advantageous would be her conversion. When the Duke of Luxemburg left Rome to return to France, he was charged by the Pope with a secret mission to the King, to whom he wished he could communicate his zeal. But whether the Duke did not fulfil his mission properly, or that Henry received the message coldly, the attempt was fruitless.¹ He explained to Pisany how useful to his master would be the conversion of Elizabeth. ‘One of the chief remedies,' writes Pisany,¹ 'would, in the opinion of the Pope, be to gain over the Queen of England and to make her a Catholic. It appears to His Holiness that your Majesty has a good opportunity of attempting this holy work by means of the great and well-advised Catholics of good morality whom you are about to send to the Queen to negotiate the release of Queen Mary. They might begin by showing her, in your name, how precarious her life is as long as she holds her present opinions, since she cannot doubt that at every moment some attempt will be made upon her life, and that she cannot again enjoy an hour of safety or of pleasure. They would point out, on the other hand, that if she became a Catholic she would remain a great queen, and one honoured and loved by everyone; and that if the Huguenots gave her trouble, your Majesty would help her with money and by all kinds of means. The Pope promised me on his own part to furnish money and place it in the hands of your Majesty, thus insuring the aid of the Catholics of England, whom he knew to be numerous; besides which the Queen would gain in heaven a crown of glory, and among the Christian nations immortal honours and reputation.'

The ambassador did not share the Pope's illusions. He knew his own Court too well to believe that it could or would follow out his views. 'Besides,' said he, 'Elizabeth's advisers would never consent to it. Even I have heard that her ministers are so powerful, and the Queen on such intimate terms with them, that, as soon as a proposal of becoming converted were made to her, she would communicate the same to those of her council who would at once turn over everything and give little satisfaction to those who had made the proposal, besides perhaps making of it a means of injuring still more the Queen of Scotland.'

The Pope replied, 'You must not think of so many things. Perhaps she is more disposed to become a Catholic than people imagine.' It is true that Elizabeth had not much encouraged his proposal that she should become a Catholic. She had laughed at it.¹ But the Head of the Church was not discouraged. He also told Pisany that several times it had been proposed to him to assassinate her, 'and for a small sum, but that he had rejected such proposals, detesting and abhorring means of that kind.'

When he learnt the death of Mary Stuart he cried. He regretted less the unfortunate Queen, whom he had tried to save, than the triumph of Protestantism,² and the loss of the support to which the Queen of Scotland, as a pretender to the English throne, had led the Catholics of England to look forward—a vain hope no doubt, but one which had given them courage. In Madrid also it caused a great grief, but for other motives. Philip II. sincerely believed that Mary Stuart was a saint, and that therefore it was not right to have a funeral service for her. His confessor and theologians reassured him on this point. They had doubts, they said, as to her sanctity, which had not yet been defined by the Church. They had less doubts as to the propriety of a funeral service, and following their advice the King assisted in person at the service, and showed signs of the greatest distress.¹

The tragic end of Mary Stuart was much felt in Rome; but the Pope consoled himself with the hope that Henry III. would avenge her death. From that time his personal affection for Elizabeth changed altogether. But while he no longer liked her, he never ceased to admire her. 'What a courageous woman!' he said to Pisany; 'she braves the two greatest kings by sea and by land.'² And to Joyeuse he remarked, 'She is a valiant woman; if she were not a heretic she would be worth a whole world.'³ To the end of his life he never despaired of converting her, believing always in the influence of his Catholic friends. When a councillor of the Landgrave of Hesse, who had been sent to Florence to treat upon certain matters, expressed the wish to come to Rome, the Pope recommended the Grand-Duke Ferdinand to send him, in the hope no doubt of influencing the Landgrave and converting him. 'Ah!' used he to exclaim, 'if one could only approach the Queen of England.' He recommended Ferdinand of Tuscany to keep up good relations with her, 'for times may come when good may be done to the advantage of religion.'⁴

The fate of the English Catholics was a matter he had much at heart. The extraordinary promotion of Monsignor Alan had been made in order that they might have an Englishman as their ecclesiastical head. This promotion took place shortly after the death of Mary Stuart, at the request of Philip, and much to the displeasure of Elizabeth. The Sacred College looked upon it as an imprudent act, because it endangered his co-religionists in England, who were then subjected to the most terrible persecutions. The King of Spain intended to send off Alan with the Armada, and to have him made Legate of England.

While at the Vatican the conversion of Elizabeth was not despaired of, the possibility of her not returning to the bosom of the Church was not lost sight of. In such a case she was to be deprived of her crown. Such was Philip's object, and the Pope's extreme measure. At the time when he was to decide, and while the expedition against England was being prepared, the Pope could not make up his mind between the two alternatives. His language and his acts often betray the impression produced upon him by news from England and Spain. They reflect his illusions as regards the personal dispositions of the Queen, the momentary disappearance of his hopes, his doubts, which are every day more justified, as regards the final issue of Philip's great enterprise. After warmly recommending war, he hesitates and cools down. After the disaster he denied or forgot that he had been one of the chief instigators of the Invincible Armada.¹ During the whole time of the war he never ceased to work at Elizabeth's conversion. He made no absolute mystery of it to Philip, but said as little as possible on the subject, not wishing to offend him. While Philip's first object was to humble and weaken England, the re-establishment of the Catholic religion being but a secondary consideration, the Pope thought of nothing but the latter, and would have far preferred Elizabeth's conversion to Philip's victories as a means of obtaining it. These sentiments were shared by the statesmen of Rome, who regretted that the Pope should become so involved in Philip's affairs. Not knowing that Sixtus¹ had insisted upon Mary Queen of Scots becoming Queen of England, the Pope's Nuncio in Madrid was surprised that His Holiness had not settled beforehand with Philip who was to succeed to the throne of England; for, said he to the Venetian envoy, Gradenigo, 'that king would like to be always master of England, while neither the Pope, nor any powerful sovereign, could consent to the great kingdom of England being annexed to that of Spain. The King, it is true, is a wise man. He says that he does not envy another's good; but opportunity, the innate desire in man of domineering, and unforeseen circumstances, might end in the establishment of a universal monarchy.'

Gradenigo asked the Nuncio what Gregory XIII. had thought on the subject. The Nuncio told him that, in the event of Philip taking possession of England, the Pope had intended himself to dispose of the crown; but that later, being impressed with the power of his Catholic Majesty, he had recognised how impossible it was to elect another prince than Philip, and had made up his mind to recognise him as King of England. This distant expedition, however, the Nuncio thought was useless, and especially hazardous, inasmuch as the King had not a single harbour of refuge near the coast of England in the event of a defeat.¹

These very modern political views, since they rested on the principle of a European equilibrium, were no doubt just. Cardinal d'Este warned the Pope against the ambition of his ally. 'I represented to him,'² he wrote to M. de Villeroy, 'how his ambition may and must alarm the Christian princes; for while he covers his enterprise against England by the pretext of the heresy of the Queen, there is little doubt that he is aiming at becoming the monarch of the whole Christian world. To this the Pope only replied that to become such a monarch would be a long business, and that there is much to do; then was silent and made no further remarks.' The cardinal got alarmed, and advised the king eventually to proffer his aid to the Spanish expedition against England, on condition that it should be postponed until the disturbances in France had been appeased.

Allowance being made for the ambition of Philip, it is not the less certain that he was obliged to strike a heavy blow at England; that the Pope could not prevent his doing so—was even in duty bound to wish him success, and to help him as much as possible. What was the state of affairs? The Church, which is always in want of secular aid, could only find it then in the King of Spain. The Emperor and the King of France were of no avail, the one from the new state of things which the Reformation had created, the other from the civil war which disturbed his country. There remained therefore but the pious and powerful King Philip. But he was only powerful and capable of lending the Church the necessary help if he were master of the seas. Without maritime supremacy the possession of Flanders, of Sardinia, of Naples, of Sicily, and of the Indies was compromised and likely to be lost. The history of the following centuries proved it. Philip understood it. England's incipient navy contested his maritime preponderance. The name of Drake, which has now almost been forgotten, then filled the world. He it was who had first dared to attack that immense power and prestige which Philip enjoyed across the ocean; who captured his galleons under the guns of Cadiz, kept up the insurrection in Portugal, and threw into the shade the legendary glory of the old Scandinavian kings. Sweeping the seas, he was to be found everywhere—on the coast of Spain, in the West Indies, at the Azores, wherever the once proud Castilian flag had waved, but which the guns of the Spanish forts could now hardly protect.

When the old Cardinal Granvella, who was still nominally prime minister, found that his master no longer kept him acquainted with the movements of Drake, he gave way. It was the final blow. He felt that his time was up, that he had but to die, and he died.¹ Such was the importance which that corsair enjoyed in the eyes of the Court at Madrid. More than once the King was obliged to give orders that his ships should not leave the harbour.¹ What a humiliation ! what trouble ! Those galleons were the very ships that were to bring him the money which he so sorely needed. Drake must be destroyed ; but he must first be met with, and this was a difficult task for the heavy ships of the Royal Navy, which, never having sailed except in security in seas wherein they rode as masters, were not sufficiently armed, and could not cope with the swift English clippers. The enemy escaped whenever they were many together, but only to return soon after, in order to pursue them, to reach them, and to destroy them if they were found alone.

Nothing was left but to attack the enemy in his home, to organise an expedition, not against the uncatchable Drake, but against the country from which his vessels sailed. The dominion of the seas, and with it the position of Spain as a great Power, were at stake. These considerations gave rise to the notion of a great expedition against England. A necessity, the greatest of all necessities, that of self-preservation, inspired Philip with the idea. It is also true that, if realised, Philip was master of England. But the conquest of England was not the object, but the consequence only of the undertaking.

Looked at from this point of view, the Pope could not but approve the arming of the 'Armada.' For reasons which are known, he soon regretted its necessity. He allowed it, however ; and, having done so, he promised the King an annual subvention of 100,000 scudi, but deplored his having to do it, as well as the Spanish slowness, which was so prejudicial to the English Catholics, the faults committed, and the time lost. He also tried to encourage the King, who had days of despondency, and desired to make peace when peace was no longer possible. After spending enormous sums in equipping his fleet, he got frightened at the difficulties of the undertaking, and at one time deliberated whether he would not treat with Elizabeth, remembering the saying of the Duke of Alva, 'Spain can go to war against all the people of the world, provided she is at peace with England.'¹ 'This morning,' wrote the Pope to Philip II.,² 'I held a consistory, and, to please your Majesty, Alan has been made a cardinal. Though, in proposing this nomination to the cardinals, I took care not to hint at the armaments which are going on, I hear that in Rome the rumour was: Now they are preparing to go to war with England. Your Majesty must therefore lose no time, in order to avoid bringing misfortune upon those poor Christians (the English Catholics); for if you delay, the good which you propose doing would become an evil. As to the help which I can give you, I have at once ordered that which Count Olivarès asked me for, and I presume he will inform you accordingly. As your Majesty is to command in person, you had better get reconciled with God before departure, for the sins of princes are visited upon the people and upon their kingdoms.'

The good understanding between the King and the Pontiff was not without being occasionally disturbed. Besides the ecclesiastical questions which almost always gave rise to some dispute, they quarrelled upon many other subjects. Count Olivarès was not a man to facilitate the settlement of any quarrel. Sometimes the Pope showed an amount of susceptibility unworthy of so great a mind. Questions of etiquette, too, easily became state questions, and Philip attached to these an extreme importance. Titles, precedence at public ceremonies, the order of visits, denoted each one's part in the splendour and royal favour of which the King was the supreme dispenser. To be wanting in respect to the smallest of his 'criados' was to fail in respect towards himself; to commit high treason; to be disrespectful to God, whose representative he believed himself to be upon earth, at least in his own States, which were spread throughout the world. The Pope, who knew nothing about etiquette, and was susceptible precisely because he knew so little about it, had his eyes for ever open to the King's doings. He everywhere saw some encroachment upon the rights of the Church. His anger knew no bounds when he heard that at Venice the Spanish ambassador required the Nuncio to pay him the first visit. 'It is unheard of,' he exclaimed—'inauditum a sæculo.'¹

Alberto Badoer, who was the Venetian ambassador, tried to calm him, by expounding a whole code of etiquette in the sixteenth century, and insinuating in clothed language that 'visits are matters which concern private individuals; that they concern politeness and education, not politics or the State. Whoever leaves, pays a visit to take leave, whoever arrives is paid the first visit. He himself on arriving in Rome had had the visits of the ambassadors of France and of Spain. He could not on that account look upon himself as their superior, or that the Republic takes precedence over the mightiest sovereigns. He who fails to follow out these rules is looked upon as badly educated, but it cannot affect the prestige of princes.' The Pope was at last appeased, but repeated that nuncios were people out of the common. Other disagreements of a more serious nature took place on other questions. Philip, who was lax in the details of his vast administration, sometimes invented rules and issued decrees which affected the rights of other sovereigns, and excited the Pope's jealousy and anger.

Tired out by the constant squabbles between his representatives in Italy, the Viceroy of Naples, Count Olivarès, and Prince Doria, who had ceased all relations¹ with one another because one refused to call the other Excellency, the King published a decree respecting titles which gave rise to a perfect storm of indignation in the diplomatic body at Madrid and at foreign Courts.²

¹ The Duke de Frias, stepson to the Viceroy of Naples, had been ordered to go to Rome and make the act of submission to the Pope on the part of the King. He delayed his departure owing to a question of etiquette which arose between him and Olivarès. The Duke said that Olivarès, not being a grandee of Spain, was not entitled to more than the 'mercèd' (mercy). They both appealed to Philip II., who decided that the Duke de Frias should style Olivarès Your Lordship, and the latter call the Duke Most Illustrious.—Cardinal d'Este to Villeroy, February 25, 1586.

² Lippomano to the Doge, October 18, 1586; October 25, 1586

Among the articles concerning the members of both houses of Austria, which this decree set forth, it was decided that the titles of Excellency and Most Illustrious should be confined exclusively to the cardinals and to the Archbishop of Toledo. Foreign ambassadors, called chapel ambassadors, or ambassadors belonging to great Courts, including the Nuncio, who was not named, were simply to be styled lordships (seigneuries). The Emperor's ambassador, Baron Khevenhüller, first sounded the alarm. Reserved as he was by nature, he spoke loudly against 'that infamous production,' and announced his departure for the end of the year, the time at which the decree was to be carried into effect. The Nuncio took umbrage, but was more moderate in his expressions. When the King returned from the Escorial, he was assailed by requests for an audience. The Pope's representative spoke haughtily, declared that he would not submit to the ordinance, that the Pope was the judge, since it was the Pope that gave and confirmed titles. Baron Khevenhüller gave up his hopes of receiving the Order of the Golden Fleece, and spoke 'bravely' to the King. The Venetian envoy, 'Minimus Apostolorum' as he calls himself, spoke with much ability to the same purpose. To all these objections, the King, who was always exquisitely polite to ambassadors, merely replied, that, 'in issuing his pragmatic, he wished to remedy certain abuses, and did not intend to wound anybody, nor to be wanting in respect to sovereigns, but that what had been written was written.' The withdrawal of a decision was with him an unheard-of thing. Philip II. knew well that nothing so quickly destroyed the prestige of a prince as a change of opinion. On this point he was inexorable.

When the Pope heard of this ordinance, he insisted on the revocation of the articles to which he objected, and asked for a peremptory declaration. 'No time must be lost, Spanish fashion,' he said to Olivarès;¹ 'these ordinances must be revoked, or they shall be put in the index of prohibited books.' He then wrote himself to the King:² 'No sin is so grievous before God as the usurpation of ecclesiastical jurisdiction; history both sacred and profane can prove it. Your Majesty has been advised to extend your pragmatic to bishops, archbishops, and cardinals. It was a very great sin. You must therefore except these ministers of God from your ordinance, and do penance, otherwise some great misfortune may befall you. Do not believe those who tell you otherwise, for they are evidently flatterers or atheists. Believe me rather, whom God has given to you as your father. Believe the Holy Church, your mother, to whom you owe obedience "de necessitate salutis." If your advisers are humanists, let them read Eutropius; if they are canonists, let them read . . .; if lawyers, the book "De Sacratissimis Episcopis;" if theologians, the 1st and 2nd tracts of St. Thomas; and then they will no longer give such bad advice to your Majesty. Cæsar Octavius and other pagan emperors had so much respect for ecclesiastical jurisdiction that, before framing any laws "circa sacra," they first had themselves elected pontiffs. The great sin you have committed has made me shed many tears. I trust that you will make amends, and that God will forgive you. To the Vicar of Christ is due implicit obedience in all that relates to salvation. I hope that you will obey me.'

This half quarrel was contemporaneous with the preparations for the Armada expedition. Never had a good understanding between Rome and Madrid been more necessary. The King, however, seemed decided not to withdraw a single ordinance. He put the case before the Council. Did the pragmatic encroach upon any of the liberties or upon the dignity of the clergy? The Council resolved the question in the negative. The Pope referred the matter to the Consistory, declaring 'that his beloved son King Philip, in arrogating to himself the right of jurisdiction over cardinals and ecclesiastics, had committed a sacrilege. Why! the King refuses to obey because his ministers advise him not to do so? It was not thus that the Emperor Theodosius acted when St. Ambrose prohibited his entering the church. He never replied that his friends advised him not. He obeyed, submitted, did penance, and was then admitted into the church.' This harangue lasted an hour, and ended by his prohibiting the cardinals, under penalty of excommunication, to obey the pragmatic. The King was much hurt and distressed to find that his quarrels with the Pope were thus disclosed to the whole world, at a time when it was so necessary that the world should believe that the most perfect harmony existed between them. He avoided showing how vexed he was ; but he ceased writing to the Pope, and only communicated with him through his ambassador.¹ While the Spaniards who resided in Rome were loud against this vehement outbreak on the part of Sixtus V., which was so inopportune and so causeless, and only served the ends of the opposite party, already well served both at Rome and in Madrid, the King received letters from Italy throwing doubts upon the loyalty of the Pope.² How could such conduct or such language be explained on the part of an ally? Why so much money accumulated in Fort St. Angelo, when the Pope refuses to pay the subsidies? Could it be that he plots some secret undertaking, as it is rumoured, or is thinking of annexing the kingdom of Naples to the Pontifical States? Why such an intimacy with Venice? Does he intend to gain her over to his secret views by offering her those territories which she formerly possessed in Apulia? Does he expect to outlive the King, for during Philip's lifetime he could not think of accomplishing such vast projects, unless he found some ally like the Republic of Venice, which would not be compromised as long as the King reigned? These rumours were current in Philip II.'s ante-chambers and in those of his advisers. They came from Italy, where for a time they were believed. Brought by the newsmongers of the period, they found their way into the books of some of the authors of the following century, and thus acquired the reputation of being facts. Nothing, however, was more false. Sixtus never dreamed of conquering Naples. Such an ambition, for which Pope Caraffa had been severely punished, could not come into the head of so practical a man. Neither Philip nor his ministers believed in these rumours. The latter implored of their master not to show his anger, to be indulgent to the hasty temper of the Pope, to give way in the matter of the ordinance, and to be certain that Sixtus, besides knowing how difficult a descent upon Naples would prove, and looking upon the Catholic King as the principal defender of the Christian Church, as the strongest opponent of Protestantism and of the Turks, would never, out of a purely vain desire of glory, throw the Christian world into disorder, or spend his money without any chance of turning it to profit.

The King followed this advice, which was so well adapted to his manner of thinking as well as to his character. Instead of showing any susceptibility, he was even more attentive. When the Pope wished to marry his grand-nephew, he met his wishes by facilitating the union of Michel Peretti with Margaret, the only daughter of Count de la Somaglia. On the other hand, Sixtus was not insensible to these civilities. They were not in error who said that he appreciated Philip's importance in the light of the interests of the Church. When the King's health began to fail, the Pope showed the greatest concern. His fears had a cause. Philip had the gout, and, to the despair of the German doctor of the Dowager Empress, he was being for ever purged and bled, according to the customs of the country. He was rapidly declining, but still worked incessantly, writing himself, and becoming more and more inaccessible even to his ministers, much more to ambassadors.

The death of Cardinal Granvella occurred in the midst of the war preparations. Had it occurred earlier, it would have been an event; then it passed without notice. The cardinal was but an illustrious old man, who departed from life long after having given up public affairs. He had stuck to power with great tenacity, showing, as so many others have done, that it is easier to get upon the wide stage of the world than to come down from it willingly and with dignity when the hour of retreat has sounded. The King, who had always a great regard for those who served him, had left him a kind of pretence of his former grandeur, but had long ceased to consult him. 'That great statesman died with prudence and constancy,' as the Venetian envoy writes to the Doge. The King had written to him to say 'that his illness gave him great concern.' The cardinal sent back word that his concern was well founded, for he lost a faithful servant, who had never hesitated in the defence of his interests to call down upon himself the hatred of all the princes of the earth.¹ Sixtus V. learnt the news of his death with indifference. He said to Gritti, 'Why did he quit Rome, where he could live with honour, and take the direction of his sovereign's affairs in Italy? whereas, by going to Spain, he has exposed himself to what has occurred, for the Spaniards cannot stand being governed by foreigners. The King made no use of him, and gave his confidence to that deaf and blind Don Juan de Zuniga, and Ydiaquez. How can it be wondered at that Drake, and even the corsair Murat-Reiss, should do them harm, since the King's council is in such a state, and since, not to augment the authority of the nobility of his land, he calls only men of low extraction into the Cabinet? God grant no misfortune may occur to him ; for, in that case, the nobility, anxious to take the reins of government in their own hands, might operate strange changes, not only in Spain but also in Italy.'¹

The Venetian envoy was always the person in whom he confided. When Gritti² brought him the news of the peace that had been signed between Persia and Turkey, he showed fully how displeased he was. 'This,' he said, 'is a fine opportunity lost. Now the heretics will get help from the Turks, and will do a deal of mischief.' He regretted giving 800,000 scudi a year to the Catholic King. 'The Spanish galleons,' he exclaimed, 'only traffic, and the money of the Church is spent otherwise than it should be. Hence God's wrath, the humiliations and reverses which the King meets with in Holland, in Flanders, where he takes one town to lose two ; while a woman can make coalitions with the princes of Germany and of Navarre, and find in herself the means of upsetting the whole world.' Gritti, in giving an account of this interview, implores

the Doge to keep it secret. The suspicions which he thinks he notices in the Pontiff's heart as regards the loyalty of Philip strike him greatly. 'It is certain,' he writes to the Doge, 'that the King of Spain is arming, but it is not equally certain that those armaments are directed against England.'¹ The Doge was discreet, and the Pope continued to give Gritti his confidence. 'For goodness' sake,' said the Pope on one occasion, 'let those Venetian noblemen behave in such a way that we may remain friends, that there may be no cause for our quarrelling, but that we may help one another.' Then, showing him a drawing of the Holy Sepulchre which had been sent to him, and which lay on his desk, he added, 'We might buy the Holy Sepulchre from the Turks; they would give it to us for money, but that is not what we wish. We do not wish them to believe that we cannot take it by force if we please, and though, during our life-time, we dare not hope that this will be done, still we do not wish the world to believe that it is impossible. In having it transferred to Rome we should be afraid of committing a sin, and of doing that which is displeasing to God; for He chose to be born at Bethlehem and to die at Jerusalem. We also find that, though Our Lord's cradle is in Rome, no one comes to see it, while to visit the Holy Sepulchre many travel to Jerusalem. They say the pilgrims are badly treated by the Turks. We must have patience until God sends the man who, to the honour of God, undertakes the conquest of the Holy Land. One man would suffice, for the rest is not wanting. The King of Spain's forces would alone be sufficient, if he only wished to turn them to this account. He has so many kingdoms, so much money, so much power! Nor would he be alone, for who would not help him? Ferrara, Florence, Mantua, Urbino, would all combine by every means in their power. The King, it is well known, can dispose of Genoa as he pleases, and, though the Government of Venice would not compromise themselves openly with the Turks, there is not a woman in the town or continent of Venice, with a little money, who would not willingly pay for the equipment of five or six soldiers for such an enterprise. One thing is wanting: a leader—a Constantine, a Theodosius, an Arcadius, a Lothair, or some such prince. Such a prince, we fear, we shall not find during our lifetime; for among those we see there is not one capable of fulfilling such a task. Let us not despair, however! If he comes forward, we have laid by as our share some three millions, and before that sum is expended we shall take care he has more. Such an enterprise could have been set on foot with the money expended in the armament against England. Thirteen millions have already been expended, and nothing has been done. The King and his Armada are becoming ridiculous, while Queen Elizabeth knows how to manage her affairs. If that woman were only a Catholic, she would be loved by us more than any other sovereign, for she has great qualities. See what Drake is. With his small forces he has burnt twenty-five of the King's ships in the Straits of Gibraltar, and a greater number still at Lisbon ; he has pillaged Philip's fleets, ransomed the island of San Domingo, and acquired so great a reputation that the English run after him to take a part in his victories while the others run away from fear. That Spanish Armada gives us anxiety. We have strong presentiments that it will not succeed. Instead of despatching it in September last year, as we had advised, because in war nothing is so advantageous as promptitude, the King has delayed, hesitated, and given the Queen time to prepare against his coming.' Though he blamed Philip, he appreciated his worth. He knew how important it was in the Catholic interests that he should live. 'He is,' said he to Badoer, 'sixty-three years of age; and, though he makes believe that his infirmities do not trouble him, he is very ill. May God preserve him, for his life is very precious in the times we live in.'

The armaments were carried on, but with rather more zeal than practical sense. Plans were discussed, adopted, then rejected and again replaced by other plans. In the summer of 1586, work had already begun, but little progress was made. 'The French,' some one said to Lippomano, 'think too little, the Spaniards too much.'¹

What would France do? The question was an important one. Where seek a refuge in the event of failure or accident if the French ports were closed to the Spanish fleet? Philip II. tried to elucidate the matter by a direct appeal to Henry III.² 'The audacity and rashness of the Queen of England,' wrote Philip, 'exceed all limits and require to be put down. It is impossible any longer to bear with such insults, nor with the serious damage which that Queen occasions, not only to Spain, but also to the Pope, to the Catholic religion, and even to your Majesty, since she has lately recommended that the German princes should send auxiliaries to the aid of "the Béarnais."' Above all, he is obliged to impress on him the necessity of avenging common insults, and to ask the advice of Henry III., as well as to let him know what he thinks of the undertaking, which has been principally begun on account of his zeal for religion and respect for the honour of God.

Were he alone to bear the whole onus of the war, and God gave him victory, he would be satisfied with the honour of having performed such an act, and would place the kingdom of England either in the hands of the Queen of Scotland, who was so closely allied by blood to his Christian Majesty, or in those of some English Catholic nobleman.

Henry III. replied that so prudent a king could not require his advice ; that he could himself decide what was necessary to do ; and that no one pretended to hide how much the kingdom of France was troubled and perplexed. It was a pain to him to have to acknowledge that matters had come to such a pass that, if the civil war lasted, each man might do what he pleased for the common defence, and that, if peace were made, it would not be he that could prevent the Catholics or the Huguenots from helping the Queen of England if they wished. This answer seemed to be very reserved. What could have dictated it? No one knew. Neither the Pope,¹ who had made great efforts to extort from Henry III. at least a promise of neutrality while the expedition lasted, nor Don Bernardino, of Mendoza, Philip's ambassador at Paris, had been successful in obtaining a more explicit declaration. M. de Longle, French minister at Madrid, expressed himself in the sense of his master's letter.² It became evident that Henry III. would not prevent his subjects from helping the Queen because he did not ignore the fact that the League was supported by help from Madrid. If, therefore, no reliance was placed on his sympathy, his powerlessness was counted upon.

Meanwhile Philip made fresh overtures to Rodolph II. The last had been unsuccessful. He asked him, through his ambassador, to invest him with the powers of acting as his vicar in Italy. As he was obliged to recruit men in the Peninsula, he wanted to be able to exercise a direct authority over the numerous feudatories of the Emperor. Such an attempt at such a moment only increased the secret jealousy of Rodolph, and would besides have met with the strongest opposition on the part of the Electors, whose vote was necessary, and who never would have consented to give up to the King of Spain what little influence and prestige Germany still possessed in Italy. Cardinal d'Este was alarmed. He already saw 'the princes, counts, barons, and high justiciaries of Italy cited before the tribunal of the Inquisition at Milan, a tribunal worse than the Spanish one.'¹

Besides the diplomatic campaign, which had for its object to insure the neutrality of the French king; to concentrate in one man the interests of both houses of Austria in Italy; to better the relations with the Sultan,² and thus to direct against England the whole of the Spanish forces with the exception of those employed in Flanders and in Portugal, there were military and naval armaments which, as the Pope said, were proceeding so slowly that Elizabeth would have time to prepare against an attack. Not only had she time to prepare her defence, but also to put the whole Christian and infidel world on the alert. Her agents were indefatigable at Constantinople, in Morocco, in Persia, in Algeria,³ the most powerful of the African States, and these were all prepared, it was firmly believed, to co-operate with the Queen in making a diversion against Spain.⁴ Months and years passed by. Orders and counter-orders succeeded one another. Soldiers were levied in Italy and in Spain; they were marched to Lisbon and to Corunna. Both these places were filled with troops, demoralised by inaction and reduced by illness. Opportunities offered themselves, but they were allowed to pass.

Drake was far away in the West Indies. Why not take advantage of this absence to make a descent upon

Ireland? People in Rome and in Madrid wondered at this. But obstacles always presented themselves. In the fine season the Armada was not ready; in bad weather it was evident that without harbours of refuge it could not start on an expedition into hostile waters. The Pope was inconsolable, and regretted all the money that had been spent without profit. 'The Spaniards,' he said, with a sigh, to the Venetian envoy, 'are like the gardener's dog, who does not eat the cauliflowers, but does not allow others to eat them.'¹ Pisany writes to M. de Villeroy:² 'He began to speak to me of the King of Spain and of his ministers in a strange way, and said that more than 20,000 men had died on that same fleet in Portugal, and that on the day of St. Luke at Lisbon twenty-eight big ships, from want of management, had run foul of each other and had all been injured, and also that the Italians sent to Flanders last year had all died. So that everything in his opinion was going on from bad to worse, while he was made to believe that all was right, and that the army was to embark on the 4th of this month (April 1588), and begin the expedition, which he knew could not be undertaken without him; that Philip was constantly asking for the 700,000 scudi which he had promised, but which he had promised only when success had attended their efforts and they should have landed; that he had heard that since the death of the Marquis of Santa Cruz, the Duke of Medina Sidonia, whose experience and talent he questioned, had been appointed commander-in-chief. But whatever occurred he would see that nothing was done which might prejudice France or be likely to give rise to suspicion.'

In August 1588, the Armada sailed to its destruction. The first news of the disaster was communicated by the Duke of Parma. The reports of Mendoza, Spanish ambassador in Paris, who had evidently been led into error by false intelligence, had given rise to the belief in Madrid that a great victory had been obtained. Now the news came that not only was the fleet dispersed, but also probably destroyed; that the ships which had escaped the fire of the English were making their way towards Scotland, and were wandering about the Norwegian waters, which were unknown to the Spaniards; that they could not seek refuge in any of the harbours of King James, who, forgetting the murder of his mother, had thrown himself on the mercy of Elizabeth; that if they remained at sea they had to fight Drake, who had been sent in pursuit of them; that in both cases their loss was a certainty. If even the elements proved more auspicious, if the rest of the fleet were to round the western capes of England and regain the ocean, their destruction was likewise inevitable; for they had no more provisions, and if the crews escaped the enemy's fire, or being drowned, like so many others, they would perish by famine. What was to be done? Send those ships which were cruising off Corunna to revictual that portion of the fleet which was saved? But was it not to expose them to the same fate as the Armada? Prepare new armaments? It was not to be thought of at that moment. Men, money, and ammunition were alike wanting. Spain had exhausted herself in a single effort. That effort had not succeeded. She was ruined for many years. Such was the impression common to the King, his ministers, and the diplomatic body in Madrid. In such an emergency Government dissembled the news as much as possible, intercepted the private letters which came from abroad, increased the number of processions and public prayers to obtain from God that victory which had already been granted to the enemy, and, in fine, acted as foolishly in trying to repair the evil as it had been powerless to prevent it. The public stormed; made the King, who had never listened to anyone but Ydiaquez and Mora, responsible for the disaster; blamed the delay of the Duke of Parma; raised to the skies the Marquis de Santa Cruz, who had died before the departure of the fleet, and who had been so severely criticised during his lifetime; and condemned his successor, the unfortunate Medina Sidonia. Accustomed as Philip was to dissemble, and clever at appearing unconcerned whenever any good or bad fortune befell him, he was not able this time to hide his grief. Wounded to the heart, and reproaching himself with being the author of this fearful catastrophe, he shut himself up for many hours with his confessor, made a new will, and gave no more audiences. He lived ten years more, but he was no longer the same man. He never recovered his health, which was already so impaired. His countenance showed how deeply sorrow, care, and dark presentiments had poisoned the last years of his life. When his son Philip fell dangerously ill, his most intimate servants were witnesses of his despair, though even before them he tried not to show it. He wrote and signed as formerly, but never spoke. His eyes were ever lifted up to Heaven, and he no longer had the strength to go and see the child he believed to be at death's door, and whom he visited only when he was out of danger.¹

Since the destruction of the Invincible Armada, a mournful dulness reigned at the Escorial. Philip continued to work. A second Armada was to be formed. Reinforcements were to be sent to the invading army in Portugal. Lists of officers were drawn up, and commanders were chosen. 'Last year,' it was said in Madrid, 'we had an army without a chief; now we have commanding officers but no army.' Men and money were wanting. There existed still a steadfastness of purpose, but no longer that energy and activity which great troubles require, nor that genius which discovers resources and faces misfortune. At the Vatican bad temper showed how deep was the affliction the news had caused. M. de Pisany went to the Pope and boasted to him that he had always said that this expedition could not succeed, undertaken as it was without the consent and co-operation of his king. Sixtus held his tongue. He was resolved no longer to

The recovery of the future Philip III. was obtained by means of a stone called 'bel-zuar,' which was considered to have the property of arresting fever, &c. expose his treasures to be swallowed up by the Channel waters together with the Spanish galleons. Olivarès, on hearing of the disaster from the Duke of Parma, was the first to apprise the Pope of it. Italy was full of bad news, which had been received in France, in Venice, and by the members of the Sacred College, who were hostile to Spain, with mingled feelings of sorrow and joy. The Count's audiences were of a stormy character.¹ According to the terms of the convention for subsidies, the Holy Father owed the King a million of scudi. The ambassador claimed the sum. The answer was that the stipulations of the convention did not apply to this payment. Olivarès proved that, even without the convention, the Holy See was obliged to help the King in the present circumstances. He recalled the sacrifices made by his master. The Pope let him speak, though he was almost unable to contain himself from impatience. At last his anger exploded. He was a man of his word, he said, but he must first have positive intelligence respecting the Armada. Moreover he could not dispose of the money of the Holy See without the consent of the Sacred College. So weak an argument showed how ill-disposed he was towards the King. Olivarès wanted to reply, but Sixtus ordered him to speak on other matters. 'I find him,' wrote the ambassador to Philip II., 'very lukewarm in his tokens of satisfaction whenever good news comes from Spain, and not much affected by bad news from that quarter. Envy of your Majesty's greatness, and his horror at parting with money, act more powerfully upon his nature than do the welfare of the Church and his zeal to see the annihilation of heresy in the world. If he promised a subsidy, it was in the hope that the expedition would never take place. When the King's affairs are not flourishing, his pride and arrogance are unbearable ; he literally places the knife to my throat, and forgets that the harm which may be done to your Majesty is likewise harm done to the Holy See and to the cause of God. On this occasion his evil disposition has shown itself once more. I, however, hold out firmly against him.'

'In order,' wrote Olivarès on another occasion, 'that your Majesty may understand how the Pope is informed with regard to military and naval matters, I will note here that he has recommended my asking your Majesty to give orders that the fleet support the troops now before La Rochelle.'¹

Having heard that Monsignor Grassi was chosen to be the Pope's Nuncio in Madrid,² Olivarès, who did not like the appointment, had an explanation with the Holy Father, which clearly shows the nature of his relations with Sixtus V., and how unmeasured were his expressions.. A prelate, to whom the embassy of Madrid had been destined, had begged to be excused on account of his age and infirmity. Olivarès told the Pope that Mgr. Grassi was much older, but that he was so far good that he would probably die on the way, in which case His Holiness would inherit of a 'clerk of the closet,' one of the 'vacabile' appointments.

The Pope complained of the little notice the King took of his advice. He had begged the King, he said to Olivarès, to settle with the Portuguese Pretender before embarking in his great expedition against England. Don Antonio had, as a good Catholic, addressed himself to the Holy Father, and declared himself ready to give up all his pretensions to the throne of Portugal, provided he had some compensation in Italy, either the Duchy of Milan or the States in the kingdom of Naples.¹ From Madrid, however, no answer had been vouchsafed. He had implored his Catholic Majesty to ask the King of France for a harbour of refuge. This advice had met with a similar fate. Many other grievances were added to these, and Olivarès had some trouble in facing the storm. He recommended his King to write himself to Sixtus, to insist on the payment of the stipulated sums, to show a change in his politics towards him, and to threaten him with his resentment. Then, as if alarmed at this advice, which had been given in a hasty hour, he wrote four days after to beg that the King 'would satisfy the Pope in secondary matters, show him respect and affection, but be firm as regards matters of primary importance. He did not despair of bringing him back to just views, except in money matters, and except also in all that he has told the King, and which he must in truth keep to, of the irascible character of the Pope and his want of good faith.'

The facts advanced by Olivarès were correct, but the judgment he formed respecting them was the result of passion, and is not therefore trustworthy. It is true that Sixtus V. did not wish for a universal monarchy under Philip II., any more than under any other sovereign. He never disguised his opinion on the subject, but even expressed it too loudly and too often, for he had the failing of speaking too much. 'Great Christian princes,' he said, during one of his numerous conversations with the Venetian envoy,¹ 'require a counterpoise; for if one prevails, the others run the risk of giving in in many things which he may ask for.' This was not a reason for accusing Sixtus of want of faith. It is true that he did not like to part with the money he had economised, nor to place it in hands that could not deal with it, nor to spend it uselessly, as he foresaw that it would be spent if he agreed to fresh armaments in Spain. From the first he saw—and his insight was always good—the whole extent of the disaster of the Armada, the fall of the Spanish monarchy, and the little hope there was of seeing the infirm King again take the lead in the great struggles against the enemies of religion.

The complaints of Olivares against his irascible temper are more just. Whenever, with a frown on his countenance, he quietly left his seat and canopy, and began to pace the room, followed by his unfortunate visitor, on whom he imposed silence, and whom he overwhelmed with good and bad, but more often good arguments, then, indeed, he was terrible. His voice was heard in the antechamber. His secret cameriere, Monsignor Sangaletto—that faithful but indiscreet friend of Frà Felice—remained at the door of his room, his ear to the keyhole, trembling with emotion, curiosity, and fear, but reassured, however, knowing as he did that the calm would soon follow the tempest. No one could resist the old man. No one dared hold out against him, except, perhaps, and only to a certain degree, Cardinal de' Medici, who knew that he was heir-presumptive to a throne, and Cardinal de Joyeuse, who was supported by his character: he was born in Gascony. Of all who came near him, Olivarès was the only one who had never given way before the Pope's wrath.

The recriminations of the ambassador had little influence over the mind, or rather the conduct, of his master. Ever reserved and silent, Philip never betrayed his temper, but allowed his representatives the odious privilege of waging war against the Pontiff, to whom he personally always showed all the submission of a deferential son of the Church. Sixtus, on the other hand, always prayed that the precious life of Philip might be spared.¹ But the failure of the expedition against England altered for ever the relations which had existed between them.

Everyone understood how important would be the results of the disaster. Elizabeth affected to be modest, Philip to be proud. 'Deus flavit et dissipati sunt'—such is the motto on the English medal which was struck in commemoration of the victory. 'I sent my fleet against men, and not against the elements,'¹ said Philip. Both victor and vanquished attributed the result of the event to Providence. Sixtus attributed it to man: to the courage of the woman whom he admired, while he hated her; to the want of resolution and of practical sense in Philip, who henceforth fell in his opinion.

CHAPTER III.

RELATIONS OF THE POPE WITH THE VENETIAN REPUBLIC AND OTHER ITALIAN STATES.

THE state of Italy gave great anxiety to Sixtus V. Peace reigned, but it was a precarious peace. Secondary, and even petty, interests engrossed the attention of the several princes, produced an uncomfortable feeling, encouraged intrigue, and opened a field for foreigners to satisfy their ambition. The great sovereigns were then otherwise engaged. They had neither leisure nor time to pay attention to the affairs of the Peninsula, which had always been the object of their desire. Rodolph II., who was the least ambitious of the then reigning sovereigns, was paralysed in his action by the consequences of the Reformation, by the state of Germany and of his hereditary dominions. Henry III. was engaged with the League and the Huguenots. Philip II. had the wars of England and Flanders on his hands. The Sultan was at war with Persia. In order, therefore, to obtain her independence, the moment was a favourable one for Italy. To confirm that temporary peace, it was necessary to profit by circumstances, to create an Italian policy, to form a centre by uniting Venice and Florence, and to make them both cluster round Rome. As has been seen, Sixtus was in close intimacy with the Grand-Duke of Tuscany. At Venice he had left a bad name as an Inquisitor, and when there he had been somewhat harshly treated. He had to efface the memory of the one, and himself to forget the latter. He set to work. A lucky circumstance helped him. The ambassador of the Republic, who enjoyed among the politicians of his country a great reputation, and had the confidence of the Senate, being similarly disposed to the Pope, forestalled the wishes of the Pontiff.

Lorenzo Priuli was born in 1538, had studied at Padua, gone rapidly through all the careers which it was necessary for a patrician to follow, and obtained high positions at an age when he was comparatively young. At the time of the league against the Turks, he was ambassador at Madrid. He next resided in the same capacity at the Courts of Gregory XIII. and of Sixtus V. He became afterwards Patriarch of Aquila, was made a cardinal by Clement VIII., and died in 1600, much regretted and esteemed by his countrymen. It was chiefly to his embassies in Madrid and in Rome that he owed his great reputation. These high functions were not much sought after. The Senate was even at times in difficulty to find men who would undertake them. The salary was insufficient, the duties onerous, and the transactions of such a nature as often to excite private hatreds, or give rise to the suspicions of the Senate. Diplomatic agents were expressly forbidden to receive any presents, and the Government of Venice, who in this respect, as in many others, anticipated the following century, took care that the prohibition should be strictly enforced. The ambassadors were elected by the Senate, and if those who were chosen to fill such posts were anxious to avoid the honour, they were liable to considerable fines, which were determined by law.¹ To be named ambassador, it was necessary to have an acknowledged capacity to fill the post, to enjoy public credit, and to possess some fortune. In other words, it was necessary to be an important personage. The representatives of the Republic all satisfied these conditions, and therein lies the secret of their constant successes and often brilliant victories at the time which now engages our attention. Priuli in a very few days won the confidence and friendship of Sixtus V. The past was soon forgotten, and the relations between the two States were all that could be wished.

When the new Nuncio, the Archbishop of Capua, presented his letters of credence to the Senate, he made a speech which did not resemble the ordinary reticent and prudent official discourses. 'If His Holiness Sixtus the Fifth,' said he, 'most illustrious signori, could have expressed himself what he feels, you might yourselves have noticed in his words, in his countenance, in his gestures, how real is the paternal love which he entertains for you, how true are the wishes he forms for the greatness of your country, for the prosperity and splendour of the Republic. The Pontiff will never cease, either to give you proofs of his friendship, or to call down upon you the blessings of heaven. It is with extreme pain, as well as parental anxiety, that he sees you surrounded by powerful enemies; and that you may defend yourselves against the incursions of the barbarians, against the hostilities of the infidel, he offers you the treasures of the Church, the revenues of the Holy See, and even his own life. He expects from you in return a filial love of, and ardent zeal for, the Catholic religion, which must never be judged according to the measure of State reasons, but must be received with a right spirit and an entire faith, for it never varies, and neither events nor the will of man can change it. It is owing to its obedience to the Holy See, to the observance of the sacred canons, that this illustrious Republic is indebted for having risen out of nothing into grandeur, power, and celebrity. It is by its union with the Holy See that it will consolidate, not only its own tranquillity at home, but also its prestige in Italy.'

To this speech, which was remarkable as exposing, under commonplace observations, the whole of the Italian programme of the Pope, the Doge replied: 'For centuries the Republic has never had so much cause for rejoicing at the good understanding which at present exists between it and the Holy See. Under Gregory it never was met except by refusals and prejudices. Now it only has cause for rejoicing.' This was not an exchange of compliments, but of just appreciation and true sentiments, seldom found on similar occasions.

Acts follow words. The Doge observed to the Roman representative that he had been received with unusual honours. The Pope in return gave the most flattering reception to the embassy that went to congratulate him on his accession.¹ The latter was composed of statesmen of high rank, and each bearing a great name. One of them, Leonardo Donato, had represented the Republic at the Court of Gregory XIII. The others were Marcantonio Barbaro, Giacomo Foscarini, and Marino Groniani. They brought for the grand-nephews of the Pope, Alexandro Montalto and Michel Peretti, titles of Venetian noblemen. Sixtus V. had recommended the Roman barons and prelates to escort the ambassadors on the occasion of their solemn entrance, which took place with extraordinary pomp. Michel Peretti went to meet them, and introduced them in the Sala Regia, where they were received most graciously in public audience. Donato made the customary speech, and moved the Pope to tears. These Sixtus could shed easily, but was not accustomed to shed in public. Everyone was astonished, and the diplomatic body, who were curious to know the cause of this emotion, were unsuccessful in their endeavours to hide the anxiety which this growing intimacy with

Venice awakened in them. During their short stay in Rome, the Ambassadors-Extraordinary, accompanied on every occasion by Lorenzo Priuli, were several times admitted to an audience of the Pope. They had pleased him from the first, by congratulating him on the security which travellers now enjoyed upon the roads on which lately they could not travel without danger of losing their lives. This was flattering a weakness of the Pope, who was not only proud of having got rid of the banditti, but was also flattered by the comparison with his predecessor. Italy and Turkey, the vulnerable part in the Venetian policy, were then spoken of. They feared that the irascible Pontiff would induce them to adopt an aggressive policy towards their terrible neighbours. He reassured them on this score. 'We do not wish,' he said, 'that the Republic should compromise itself. We know that it must act cautiously with the Sultan; that it has not forces enough to fight him alone and unaided, and that he leaves us alone for the present because he is occupied elsewhere, but that he will do us a deal of harm as soon as his hands are free of Persia. What you require is, to profit by the time which he gives you to prepare yourselves, and to wait until I am ready. The Republic is therefore right not to open hostilities at the risk of being afterwards abandoned by the other Christian princes, who, alas! think only of satisfying their own ambition, and even worse than that. They really do not care if they lose one eye, provided they can tear out two of another. They mutually prevent each other from doing good, and allow the common enemy to profit by their dissensions. Let the Republic be careful, therefore, not to come to open warfare with Turkey, but let it co-operate with us secretly, well and good, and wait until the other Christian princes are well bound to the cause. Then only must it join. This was always the opinion we held when cardinal, but which, as we were new in the office, was not listened to. All we ask of the Republic is to be prudent. Its captains at sea are often guilty of violent acts against the Mussulmans; let the Republic give Turkey the satisfaction of punishing those pirates, but not too severely. This is what in our time, when we were in Venice, those good old senators used to do, who, whenever a case of the kind occurred, gave out that they would punish the criminal, but who never were harsh upon their own people, and took care not to give the Turk the satisfaction of beheading a Christian.'

Then, talking of the affairs of Italy, he recommended them to visit Florence, and to effect a good understanding with the Grand-Duke. 'It is in your interest,' he said, 'that you should be in good relations with him, for he is a great prince in Italy, and has the Republic in high esteem, as indeed his marriage has proved. He could choose a wife wherever he pleased, in Italy or elsewhere, but he preferred marrying a Venetian lady and a daughter of the Republic.¹ We desire, also, to live in good harmony with Savoy, Mantua, Ferrara, and Florence. We hope that all the princes of Italy will live in good harmony with each other, not for the purpose of a league, for we wish to offend nobody, but because, if we live in such good understanding, no one will dare molest us, but all, on the contrary, will have a great respect for Italy, and we shall all enjoy the most perfect tranquillity. We hope that the Republic will be more careful to keep its affairs secret. All that it does is known. Our agents send us whole sheets full of reports of the deliberations of the Government. It is the truth. We tell it you because we like the Republic; but we do not like that all we say to you confidentially, through your ambassador, should be known at once by all the other princes, who then at once suppose that we have a great partiality for the Republic, which we love, it is true, but in favour of which we should not do anything displeasing to Spain or to other sovereigns.'

This want of secrecy, which made the Venetian envoys despair (and they complained even more than did the Pope), often gave rise on the part of Sixtus V. to amicable remonstrances. 'Your gentlemen,' he said, 'know everything that takes place in the Senate, and go and report the secrets of the State in public places and in certain churches. They are not like the gentlemen of other countries. They are almost princes. Their words carry weight; they ought, therefore, to act as princes—they ought to be silent.'¹

The Ambassadors-Extraordinary, much pleased also with the result of other matters upon which they had had to treat, left Rome with the best impressions, having themselves produced the same upon others. The customary banquet at the Palace San Marco had been magnificent. The four cardinal-princes, Farnese, D'Este, Gonzaga, and Medici, the Venetian Cardinals Castagna and Fachinetti, both formerly nuncios, had been invited. The little Cardinal Montalto had not been forgotten, nor had his brother Michel, for whom the Pope showed so much tenderness.¹ The Roman public, then, as now, jealous of being honoured by the pomp which foreign ambassadors display in their receptions, and liking to revenge itself by sarcasm whenever the luxury of the entertainment had not come up to its expectations, admired the splendour of the four ambassadors of the Republic. The Pope himself was not insensible to this display, when he calculated how much it cost them to do him honour. Notwithstanding the simplicity of his habits, the Pope liked official pomp. Cardinal d'Este was wont to reproach him with this taste. 'He was,' he said to Villeroy, 'a pope envious of such vain glory and incense, which were much esteemed by him.'² He created the ambassadors Knights of Holy Church, and knighted them himself in the Sala Costantina. Two of them, who were already knights, had some scruples (it was the sixteenth century) as to whether they should accept such an honour; but the Pope removed the difficulty by saying that the two dignities did not destroy one another, and that, besides, the dignity of Knight of the Church was as superior to the other orders as the authority of the Pope was to that of other princes. On both sides these good feelings were appreciated. Sixtus had sometimes recourse to the intervention of non-official people, either to maintain the Government of Venice in its amicable disposition towards the Holy See, or to drive away the causes which might have brought on a coolness. These causes were easily furnished by the Pope's irascible temper and freedom of expression, as well as by the attitude of the Nuncio at Venice, who tried, more than was prudent, to adopt the tone of his master. Cardinal Cornaro was then wont to interfere, in order to calm the susceptibilities of the Republic. 'The Pope,' he used to say, 'is of an impressionable nature, but has a kind heart, as is often the case with hasty tempers. He likes the Venetians. They are children, he had said; they want toys; they shall have them. In small things we will easily satisfy them by giving them concessions, bishoprics, livings, churches, in order to prove to the world how much we care for them.' Then came the grievances: how little regard was shown at Venice for the Inquisition and the religious orders; how the secrets of the State were divulged; what excesses were committed by the Capelletti; the Albanian 'gendarmerie;' the robbery of his messengers' effects;¹ but, on the whole, there was nothing wanting in the good understanding between them. The Republic gave a signal proof of its respect for Sixtus V. in presenting him with a palace at Venice, to buy which the Senate had paid 20,000 or 25,000 ducats, and which was destined as a residence for the Nuncio.

The mission of Lorenzo Priuli came to an end

one year after the election of Sixtus. Giovanni Gritti replaced him during the three subsequent years. He was not of so high an order of intellect, but had some valuable qualities. The same may be said, and more, of his successor Alberto Badoer, who was still ambassador at the time that the Pope died.

The ambassadors used to see His Holiness once a week. He was wont to converse with them for hours, and they sent the Doge the substance of their conversations, often even the very words of the Pontiff, who in preference to the others liked to open himself to them and to indulge his uncontrollable desire to speak. The affairs of Italy took up the greater part of his conversations. He was for ever recurring to them. With no less frankness, though with less effusion, he was wont to speak upon the subject with the other ambassadors; but his language was invariably the same. 'Confederacies are odious to us,' he once said to Giovanni Gritti;¹ 'the only league we can be brought to conclude is this: if a prince wages war against the Turks, we will help him; if another does the same against the heretics, we will likewise help him: but leagues between several princes we have never approved of.' The whole of his policy lies therein. 'What profit did you derive from your league in '37 with Pope Paul III. and Charles V.? It lost you the Morea and a great portion of Dalmatia. With half the expenses of the war, the Republic might have settled matters with Turkey and not lost an inch of ground. When we, in '59, were in Venice, you were fortifying the island of Cyprus, and the good Franciscan Fathers, who were wise men, said to me, "The Republic is buying war with Turkey." Whenever it was rumoured that the Venetians were negotiating some confederation, the Pope always hastened to deny it. When he learnt that the Republic had gone too far in European politics, he reprimanded it strongly. 'We hear on all sides,' he told Gritti, 'that Venice is jealous of the greatness of Spain, that she is not rendering her good service, and that, on the plea of wishing for peace, she favours the King of France and promotes a war in Italy. Let the French come! If it is to attack Spain, Spain will defend herself: if it is against Italy, thank God we are strong enough to receive them. We think that the Republic would do well not to meddle with other people's affairs, but look to her own, and keep her men and her money for her own requirements.'¹ 'We are asked to join a confederation of Italian princes, to defend ourselves against the foreigner. We shall do nothing of the sort, for that would suffice to bring on, instead of repelling, a war on Italian ground.' It was only towards the end of his pontificate, that, alarmed by Count Olivarès, who threatened him with a war with Spain,² he suggested to the Venetian envoy the idea of an Italian confederation, an idea thoroughly contrary to the principles which had constantly guided his policy. Apart from this moment of weakness, Sixtus V. never gave up his fundamental principle of opposition to any system of coalition in the Italian States.³

During the whole of his reign, he never wearied in his endeavour to establish good relations between Florence and Venice, between Venice and Ferrara, between Ferrara and Mantua, between Venice and the Order of Malta. His object was to consolidate peace among the Italian princes, to keep within bounds their local ambition, to bring them more together, not for any purpose, but for the sake of the common attitude they might eventually take ; to render them all sufficiently powerful to counterbalance, under his supreme direction, the preponderance in Italy, not in Europe, of Spain one day, of France another, or of the Emperor, should the German branch of the Hapsburgs supplant that of Spain at the death of Philip II., which he believed to be near. The maintenance of the territorial status quo formed the basis of his essentially conservative and pacific policy, while he was anxious to preserve as much as possible ¹ the independence of Italy, that is to say, of part of it, since one-third of Italy belonged to the Crown of Spain. That Sixtus V. ever thought of conquering territory, or of going to war with Philip II., or of remodelling the map of Italy, is altogether untrue.² His fighting propensities were all for a war against the Turks, the Huguenots, the enemies of the Church ; but not against the sovereign who was its most devoted and most powerful protector.

¹ Several authors have supposed that Sixtus V. had ambitious projects, which he wished to realise with the help of the Grand-Duke of Tuscany. I have seen many official documents, and a series of the Pope's letters to the Grand-Duke, and have found nothing that could justify such a supposition.

CHAPTER IV.

SIXTUS V. AND THE DUKEDOM OF SAVOY.

CHARLES EMMANUEL, of Savoy, the son of the celebrated Emmanuel Philibert, had from the time of his accession gained the affection of the Pope. On the occasion of his dispute with the Duke of Mantua respecting Montferrat, he wrote to Sixtus, that he would always regulate his conduct according to his advice and commands.

This young prince had just celebrated his marriage with the Infanta Catherine, youngest daughter of Philip II., at Saragossa, where the Court of Spain was then residing. The Italian princes took umbrage at this, and in Paris such an alliance between the Catholic King and the sovereign who was master of the Alpine passes, was not looked upon with pleasure. Every eye was fixed on the old city of Aragon, which was then resplendent with all the great but dull magnificence of Philip, gay with popular fêtes, and filled with strangers whom curiosity and Court duties had brought within its walls. Europe followed anxiously the celebration of a marriage which foreboded important results, and an increase of Spanish influence in Italy, perhaps even fresh undertakings either against Switzerland or in the direction of France. On this account the nuptials of Charles Emmanuel possess an historic interest.

On Sunday, March 10, 1585,¹ the Duke of Savoy was to make his entry into Saragossa. At four o'clock in the afternoon the King went to meet him. Don Diego of Cordova had been commissioned to measure the exact distance of 400 paces, and to mark the spot where the interview was to take place. It took place near the Monastery of the Franciscans called the 'Jesú.' The King was accompanied by the whole of his Court and by the nobility of the town. Among the Spanish grandees, the High Admiral, Duke Pastrana, the Prince of Ascoli, Marshal Denia (Borja), Don Rodrigo de Mendoza, Don Alonzo de Leyva, Count of Valentia, Count Cienfuegos and his brothers Don Francisco and Don Diego, were remarkable for their costly and elegant accoutrements. When the place of rendezvous had been reached, the Dukes of Albuquerque and Medina Celi, the Constable of Navarre, Marshal Aguilar, Prince Arsolí, the High Admiral, and other grandees, their heads covered with the cap, took their seats round the Sovereign. At forty paces off, and to the right of the King, the titled gentlemen,² with their caps in their hands, together with the Spanish guard, formed a large square. The German guard and the archers surrounded the person of the King. More than an hour had passed in waiting, when the Duke and his suite appeared. The carrying away of a bridge by a torrent, as often happens in Spain, had stopped his progress. He was preceded by a hundred postilions on horseback, each blowing a horn. In the midst of this noise—which was thought rather fine—everyone alighted. Charles Emmanuel advanced, and, kneeling, requested permission to kiss the King's hand ; but Philip made him get up, and embraced him. A long discussion, as to who should show most politeness, ensued. The King insisted on his future son-in-law taking his right, but the latter persistently refused. As they were returning to Saragossa, he often stopped his horse, not wishing to go before his father-in-law, who did the same, so that the palace was not reached before sunset. By way of an exception, the King seemed lively and pleased. He called his son-in-law first 'Duke,' then 'My son,' and the conversation never tarried on the way. As they were about to alight from their horses another amiable contest occurred, as the Duke refused to take precedence of the King.

In the evening, the nuptials took place, in the great hall of the castle. Cardinal Granvella married the couple, in the presence of all the Court. The Nuncio and the Venetian ambassador, Gradenigo, were present as witnesses. On a platform, upon which a gold carpet had been spread, were to be seen all the presents of the bride—jewels and pearls valued at 50,000 ducats. When the ceremony was over, the Cardinal of Seville, the Archbishop of Saragossa, the ladies, each accompanied by her 'gallant,' came to kiss hands, and passed before the King—who was standing all the while—the Prince of Asturias, and the Infantas. Philip II. wore the simple and sombre dress which has been reproduced in so many engravings, as well as in the celebrated picture of him in the gallery at Madrid—a doublet of black cloth, a cloak of the same colour, trimmed with rare furs. The Infantas wore gowns of white and silver. A single diamond of enormous size fixed to the body of the bride's gown attracted the attention of everybody. The bridegroom had adopted the same colour, except his cloak, which was of black velvet. All the costumes, except that of Philip, were resplendent with pearls and precious stones. A ball ended the day. During the dancing, the King was seated on a raised platform, under a canopy, having on his right the future Duchess of Savoy and her affianced husband, on his left the Infanta Isabella and the heir-presumptive, seated on stools. The assembly was composed of all the ladies, the grandees, and other notables and equerries in waiting, as well as the suite of the Duke. At the request of the King, six ladies danced a minuet, which had great success. Towards the end of the ball, which lasted two hours, the Infanta Isabella danced with her young brother, and the Infanta Catherine with the Duke of Savoy. When they had done they returned to the platform, and the King got up. It was the signal for departure; everyone left, and the princes and princesses had supper each alone in their apartments.

The following day, March 11, the marriage was performed in the Cathedral. The King, clad in black¹ even on that day, but dressed with studied elegance, went to the church with the Infantas, the hereditary Prince, and the Duke of Savoy, all of whom were in pink, with gold embroideries. His Majesty was preceded by Cardinal Granvella and the Cardinal of Seville, by the Nuncio, the Venetian Envoy, and the whole Court. The archbishop received them at the entrance of the church. The marriage took place in the principal chapel, Philip being his son-in-law's witness, and Donna Isabella that of her sister. The procession returned to the palace in the order in which it came, and to the sound of music, and in the midst of the enthusiastic acclamations of the people. A sumptuous repast was afterwards served by twenty-four knights in the big room. At seven dancing commenced. The order of the evening was the same as on the preceding night. It was remarked that the Duke was most attentive to his young bride, who sat by his side, was very silent, and kept her head turned a little the other way. When the ball was nearly over, the Infantas left the platform, and danced, very gracefully, 'the high and the low step.' While the princesses danced, the King, with his cap in his hand, was standing on the platform. When the Court retired, a herald announced that Don Juan of Rodaxi was ready to fight anyone who would accept a combat with him, in the name of the town of Saragossa, and was prepared to break four spears in that cause.

The young Duke profited by his stay with Philip to ingratiate himself with him. He adopted all the seriousness of Spanish ways, and treated his followers, who were accustomed to the familiar manners of their country, with a stiffness which offended them. The grandees of Spain, though polite, in order to please the King, saw with a jealous eye the distinguished welcome which Philip had given to the Duke. When the latter left for his States, he was completely Spanish, and it was no longer doubted that, with the help of his ambassador, Baron Sfrondrati, Philip henceforth would reign at Turin, as he did at Milan and at Naples.¹

Immediately on his return, Charles Emmanuel conceived the idea of an expedition against Geneva. That town was then the rendezvous of the Protestant refugees, and one of the great centres of the Reformation. The Duke caused the Pope to be informed of the risk to which religion was exposed in his States, which were open to the invasion of the heretics, and how urgent it was to oppose a barrier against the evil, and even to root it out. Nothing was easier. He was already in communication with agents in that town. The guardian of one of the gates had been bribed. Switzerland, divided as it was by religious strife, was not in a position to come to the rescue of Geneva. The Catholic Cantons would not lend their assistance. France was in the same position. His father-in-law approved of the undertaking, and the Pope's co-operation would ensure success.

However peaceful had been the designs of Sixtus V. as regards Italy, he seized with eagerness the fine opportunity which was thus offered him of drawing the sword, at the very outset of his reign, in the cause of religion. Such a campaign, on a small scale, pleased him, until his treasures, which were not yet considerable, allowed him to execute designs of a greater importance, such as re-converting England, or breaking the power of the Sultan. He shared the views of the young Duke, who knew so well how to veil his ambitious designs under the pretence of anxiety for the maintenance of the faith in all its purity, and it was in vain that Monsignor Ottinello, the Nuncio in Turin, called the attention of the Pope to the afterthoughts of Charles Emmanuel in this design. Sixtus was determined to associate his name with this pious war, granted monetary help, levied soldiers in his own States, and gave the command of these troops to two renowned officers, Antonio Orsini and Count Sarno.¹ He even asked that the expedition might be made in the name of the Holy See; but this request was allowed to drop, because it did not please the Duke. Statesmen, aware of the state of Europe, regretted that the Pope, who was not yet acquainted with it, should engage himself in an expedition which, according to them, could only end in a compromise.²

Facts proved that they were right. In France, the news of what was going to take place gave rise to loud expostulations, which were communicated to Turin in unmeasured expressions of disapprobation, and to Rome in language which, while it was respectful, was nevertheless peremptory. Sixtus V. thought it best to listen to this remonstrance, and to calm the natural susceptibilities of the Paris Cabinet. From the very first Cardinal d'Este spoke to the Pope on the subject. Seeing that they who were near his Holiness tried to bring him under the sole influence of Philip II.—not an unlikely hope on their part—the Cardinal suggested to Henry III. that he should write to the Pope, and ask him to postpone the expedition against Geneva until the war against the French heretics was over, and give him to understand ‘that at the present time a gathering of troops on his frontier would give rise to suspicions; but that if once the Huguenots should be beaten, he might himself perhaps join in the war against the heretics of Geneva.’¹

The Pope tried to calm him. If Geneva were conquered by the Duke, he said, it would be given neither to Philip nor to his son-in-law. It would be constituted into an independent State, and placed under the suzerainty of the bishop. These remarks had no effect in Paris, and the expedition had to be abandoned. Sixtus consoled himself by withdrawing the account he had opened in favour of Charles Emmanuel. Later, the Duke resumed hostilities, occupied certain portions of the territory of Geneva, but could never penetrate into the town. He had no longer the help of the Pontifical treasury, and the Pope regretted—in fact denied—that he had ever engaged himself to take a part in the expedition. Thus ended the incident which at one time had seriously jeopardised the peace of Italy.²

The young Duke had vainly endeavoured to obtain the title of King of Sardinia. He hoped to receive that island from his father-in-law, in exchange for some territory near the Milanese. But his Catholic Majesty, notwithstanding the pressing entreaties of his daughter, who found that the modest title of Duchess was unworthy of her position as an Infanta of Spain, peremptorily declined to have a hand in that transaction, fearing, apparently, that similar pretensions might be raised at Florence.

Devoured by ambition, Charles Emmanuel then conceived another plan. Again he sought the assent and co-operation of the Pope. His ambassador in Rome had several interviews with the Pontiff. He was constantly seen at the Vatican. Sometimes he had been caught on his way through a private door into the Pope's cabinet, and was supposed, therefore, to be negotiating some important matters. What was their object? How would all these secret audiences end? What was the purport of the incessant exchange of messages which was going on between Rome and Turin? People asked these questions, but the Pope and the ambassador were mysteriously silent. At last the secret was known. People learnt that, without the slightest provocation, and while at peace, the Duke of Savoy had, without any plausible motive, directed his forces, which it was believed were before Geneva, against the Marquisate of Saluzzo, which belonged to France.¹

In Paris, as in the rest of Europe, the Duke of Guise was suspected of having been the instigator of that sudden attack. The suspicion was erroneous. The head of the League favoured the expedition secretly, but the initiative was that of Charles Emmanuel, who had prepared the attack, with the knowledge and approbation of the Pope.¹ The Duke had made him believe that the Marquisate was full of Huguenots, that Savoy was in danger of being overrun by heretics, that Henry III. was not able to maintain the Catholic religion there, and that he would take that duty upon himself.

The Holy Father shared these opinions, but made the Duke give him a written declaration, by which he undertook to restore that small State to the King of France, provided His Majesty should send a Catholic to take possession of it.

By a verbal announcement through his ambassador, Charles Emmanuel made known to Henry III., who was then at Blois, that he intended to occupy the fortified places of the Marquisate of Saluzzo, in order to shelter them against an attack of Marshal de Lesdiguières, and thus to preserve them for the King. The next day a French courier, whom he had detained for three days, arrived at Blois. His despatches brought the news that the invasion of the marquise was an accomplished fact. The King was furious. He told the Cardinal Legate, Morosini,¹ 'that never in his life had he received news which vexed him more, not only on account of the insult offered to him by a cousin and intimate ally, and an inferior in position, but also by the loss of reputation and of territory,' adding that he was determined to avenge his outraged dignity, and that of his subjects. Before having recourse to arms, Henry III. resolved to try what persuasion could do. Negotiations were begun, but without result. The King, who was deeply mortified, declared that he would rather die than submit to such an humiliation.

When the States of Blois implored him to send an army against Savoy, he cried with joy. The truth then came out, and Sixtus V. was accused of having encouraged the Duke in this adventure. The Duke's indiscretion, and the language of the Spanish ambassadors, who everywhere declared that their king highly disapproved the conduct of his son-in-law, seemed to justify this supposition.

Philip II., anxious and displeased—for at that time he wanted to be at peace with France—thanked the Pope for the kindness he had shown to the husband of his daughter; but he begged of him to restrain the ambition of the Duke, and not to let him run to his ruin.¹ In Madrid opinions were divided in the councils of state.² Some accused Venice and the Grand-Duke of Tuscany of favouring the French, because they wanted France to leave the passage by Saluzzo open to them. Others, on the contrary, maintained that, if the marquisate could not be occupied by Spanish troops, it was better to restore it to France, and thus to put an end to the envy of Europe; that nothing could be worse than to leave it in the hands of the Duke of Savoy, for it would make him more difficult to be kept within bounds. But all praised the Pope for wishing to preserve Italy from the invasion of heresy.

Thus reduced, threatened by France, blamed by Spain, and half condemned by Sixtus V., Charles Emmanuel published a declaration, or, as we might call it, a circular, which his ministers were instructed to communicate to the respective Courts to which they were accredited, and which gave an account of his conduct which compromised the Pope greatly. His Holiness prohibited the publication of the document in Rome, saying that such justifications were not worthy of princes.

At Blois the Legate tried his best to restrain the martial humour of the King. In Rome Sixtus had to discuss the matter with Pisany and Cardinal de Joyeuse, who had become Protector of France since the death of Cardinal d'Este, and even with his friend

Gritti. He made the best defence he could; and, while he showed himself irritable and sarcastic with the French, he was gentle and confiding with the Venetian envoy.

The French cardinal, on reporting his interview, gave the substance of this conversation: 'We would wish,' said the Pope, 'that the King did not take the Saluzzo affair so much to heart. It is unusual that so great a king should trouble himself so much about so little.' The Cardinal answered that there were no Catholics in France who would not fight for so just a cause. 'Yes,' replied the Pope, in an ironical tone; 'Marshal Montmorency will gladly fight against a relative from whom he expects support, and the Duke of Guise against the son-in-law of the King of Spain! I don't know how the Duke of Guise stands with the King—I don't know that, when the Duke of Guise took Paris, the King of Spain gave him 4,000 scudi—I don't know whether now the Duke of Guise dances higher or lower than the King of Spain wishes it! I have no nuncios; and my nuncios inquire into nothing, and warn me of nothing!'

In these days of excitement, when everybody foresaw a war with Italy, Gritti never approached the Pontiff without respectfully remonstrating with him on the part of the Government of Venice.²

The Pope replied by the arguments already known to the reader. Without acknowledging as yet, as he afterwards did, that he had advised the expedition, he stood on the defensive. 'Lesdiguières threatened the marquisate. If he invaded it with his heretics, the souls of its population would be lost. What an irreparable loss! Means must be taken to provide against such an emergency. When Catholics enter a fortress they at the same time bring salvation with them.' For him one question was paramount in importance, nor did he drop that line of argument. 'Saluzzo,' he added, 'will be given back, if not to-day another day. The Very Christian King is wrong in going to war;¹ he should trust the Duke, who is his relative, and also the son-in-law of the Catholic King, who, if necessary, would come to his rescue.' The ambassador then told him of the complaints which Henry III. had addressed to Venice through his diplomatic agent there.² 'Thank the signori in my name,' said the Pope; 'but tell them that matters are not so serious as the French envoy puts them. All will be arranged; do not let the signori trouble themselves so much about it. In all Italy, at Florence and at Venice, they say that the Government of the Republic envenoms the matter. Do not be afraid of writing to them on the subject. We believe that the Government of Venice wishes no harm, but, on the contrary, good to the King of France. The King's interest is to exterminate heresy; this he should do, as we have told Cardinal de Joyeuse and the French ambassador, who daily come and weary us with requests. What does the King intend to do, now that he is so indignant with the Duke of Savoy—send his armies against him? But his kingdom is very well as it is; everyone can do in it what he pleases—seize with impunity the wife and property of his neighbour. The kingdom is not anxious for a war. And, besides, what are the King's forces? He has no more than two thousand infantry of his own. Formerly this was his excuse when he allowed the German cavalry (reiters¹) to retreat without punishing them. As for Guise, the King knows what to think of him, since he has told us so often that he was subsidised by Spain. Can he then believe that the King of Spain will go to war against Charles Emmanuel? But, it will be said that the Very Christian King will have the help of the Huguenots. He ally himself to heretics! We really do not see what he can do. Does he think that there is no one who would like to be King of France? There are many who would care to reign over that country. But, supposing the Venetians and the Duke of Mantua, who offers to be general of the army, or that Florence—for there are no others—wish to help the King, would the Republic of Venice, which is suspected of being allied with the Turks, wage war at the request of France against the Duke of Savoy, son-in-law of the Catholic King? What are the States of the Duke of Mantua—what strength, what finances can he dispose of? He lent 300,000 scudi to the King of Spain, and he would now attack that King's relative? Would Florence, surrounded as it is by Orbitello, Porto Ercole, and those other fortresses which belong to the King of Spain, dare to go against Savoy? Let the King of France get rid of the Huguenots, and he will resume his possession of the marquisate. The Duke then will not oppose him; and, if he does, we will ourselves oblige him to surrender the marquisate, for, as Pope, we will not allow the property of another to be retained, and we will cause that which belongs to the King of France to be restored to him. Should he resist we can excommunicate him, lay an interdict upon him, and declare his States free to belong to whosoever will take possession of them. We have a good deal of money, we have soldiers at our command, and we will have the marquisate restored to the King. No one wishes more than we do that the kingdom of France may be preserved entire. The people of that country are as dear to us as our own. We must defend and govern them well. The abbeyes, bishoprics, and ecclesiastical property of France belong to us; and we care particularly also, as a temporal sovereign ourselves, that there should not be on earth one prince only, but that each sovereign shall find a counterpoise in another. We have said thus much that you may repeat it to the signori. Let them consider the state of Italy, the discontented in the Milanese and in the kingdom of Naples, in Switzerland and in your own Republic. If the Huguenots were at Saluzzo they would call these to their help, which would be too dangerous a thing to do ; but, as long as Saluzzo is in the hands of the Duke of Savoy, we are sure that the heretics will not be able to penetrate into Italy.'

He was never tired of speaking in this sense ; and congratulated himself on finding that the King was getting calmer—that, at least, he was not acting, which was a great blessing. 'When a man is in a passion he does well,' he said, 'to recite the alphabet once at least.'¹

His conversations with Gritti were endless. They were good opportunities for the Pope to satisfy his desire of speaking, and he seldom missed them. 'King Louis XII.,' he said, on one occasion, 'did great injury to the Holy See. He was punished for it by having no posterity. King Francis I., instead of obeying, as he should have done, the commands of the Church, tried to make her sign concordats ; God, for this reason, deprived him of the duchy of Milan, allowed him to be made a prisoner in the hands of the enemy, and carried off his son, the Duke of Orleans, who had given great promise. In the same way, Henry II. died miserably in a tournament, and none of his sons have had children. God punished him thus for his sins.' The ambassador observed, respectfully, that if God sometimes punishes the faults of kings by visiting them with misfortune, calamities often serve, when it pleases Him to drive them away, to show His mercy. The Holy Father admitted that it is, in truth, a difficult matter to sound God's designs with respect to man, and to discover whether misfortunes are really a punishment or a means of glorifying God.

The pressing demands of the French agents, of Gondi, who had been sent specially, of Joyeuse and of Pisany, 'that obstinate man, who will not get out of the groove of his known arguments,' were particularly odious to him. 'For the last three months¹ they speak of war,' he said to Gritti, 'and what have they done? Nothing. It was far better not to say anything. Charles VIII., Louis XII., Lautrec, King Francis, Guise, in the time of Paul IV., all came here at the head of an army. What did they do? How many of their men returned to France? Do they not know that Italy is the tomb of the French? We do not fear the Duke of Savoy. Let the King send the Duke of Maine or the Duke of Guise, and Saluzzo will be at once handed over to them, whether by the Duke of Savoy or, if he refused, by ourselves. Do we not see how matters are getting on out there? Dauphiné, Languedoc, Guienne, Metz, and most of the other provinces are in the possession of the Huguenots. They only want Saluzzo to enable them to penetrate into Italy.'

On another occasion, Pisany and the Duke's agent met in the Pope's anteroom. He called them both in, and requested the latter to write to the Duke in his name, saying that he should abstain from any further proceedings against the King of France. 'Let him beware,' he said, 'of injuring a hair of the King. Let him confine himself to guarding Saluzzo, and preventing the heretics from getting in.' The Duke's agent promised to write in this sense, as he had already done; but Pisany said he might spare himself the trouble, as his master was not afraid that the Duke wished to deprive him of France. Whereupon the irascible envoy thought it prudent to retire hastily, but the Pope ran after him in a passion, and called out, 'Let the King think well on it! He would see whether the Duke would or would not make progress in France, the day we no longer kept back.'

The Duke of Parma, who was still in Flanders, remonstrated at Rome through his uncle the cardinal. He was one of those most directly interested in the non-extension of the dukedom of Savoy. Old Farnese overcame his repugnance to appear again before Sixtus V., went to the Vatican, and spoke to the Pope with all the frankness and freedom of a man who personally hopes and asks for nothing but peace. He said that it was not right to throw Henry III. into the arms of the Huguenots; that it was important, from the Roman point of view, that the kingdom of France should be preserved, that the French should have an entrance into Italy; and that this was a principle of the school which might be considered of the past, but to which he still belonged. He added a remark which shows that he knew France well. 'France,' he said, 'is now torn inwardly by factions; but let the common enemy attack her, and all parties will unite in defending the country against him.' He considered that it was ridiculous to talk so much of Lesdiguières. He knew him of old. He was unimportant, and people were wrong to be afraid of him. Sixtus replied by complaints against the Venetians. 'Holy Father,' answered the old man with a smile, 'the Venetians respect religion, but they respect other things also ; their lordships govern the State according to political rules, and not according to those of the Inquisition.' ¹

The interminable affair of Saluzzo was still being discussed, when the murder of the Guises filled Europe with horror, embittered the relations between Henry III. and Philip II., and essentially modified the conduct and secret plans of the Court of Spain² with respect to many things besides the Saluzzo affair. As to the latter point, Philip had concerted with the Duke of Guise, who, while appearing to goad Henry III. on to a war, and affecting before the Legate feelings of hostility towards Charles Emmanuel, had secretly engaged himself to prevent the King of France from undertaking the war which he meditated for the recovery of the marquisate. Lippomano, who was Venetian ambassador in Madrid, flattered himself that he had discovered the real views of the Catholic King. Saluzzo, the key to Italy, was to be taken from the French, but without going to war, through diplomatic means—through the Pope's intervention, with the help of the Duke of Guise, and especially with the help of those internal troubles which paralysed the Government of Henry III. The death of the head of the League destroyed all these plans.

Lippomano soon perceived it. The language of Ydiaquez became more imperative than it had been. He blamed the conduct of the Republic in somewhat harsh and significant words. 'His Majesty,' said Ydiaquez, 'finds the present attitude of the Republic strange. Whence its suspicions as regards his Catholic Majesty? By what right is he accused of wishing to disturb the peace of Italy? Does the Republic wish Saluzzo to be open to the French? Does it intend to call them into Italy against Spain? Is it true that the Doge does not fear a French intervention, as is publicly said in the Senate, and in the public thoroughfares of Venice? Is it to be wondered at that His Majesty and his advisers deeply resent such conduct?' The ambassador, who was much moved, requested an audience, which he could not obtain, as the King had the gout. At that time Philip was almost inaccessible. Lippomano wrote to the Doge, and begged of him to spare the susceptibility of the powerful monarch.

The latter, foreseeing a rupture with France, was resolved in future to take openly the part of his son-in-law. Philip had no longer then the same motives to spare the feelings of the French Court. The taking of Saluzzo was no longer a source of annoyance to him. He resolved even to profit by it. Meanwhile he promised eventually his support to Charles Emmanuel, on the condition that Carmagnola, one of the fortresses of the marquisate, should be handed over to the Duke of Terranuova. The murder of the chiefs of the League had brought about this change in his views respecting Henry III. Foreseeing a war with France, he prepared for it, whether he should accept or even provoke it, as circumstances might determine. From that moment the affair of Saluzzo ceased to be more than an incident, and the diplomatic imbroglio which had alarmed the whole of Europe was soon forgotten in the midst of more serious preoccupations.¹

¹ Saluzzo in the following century was definitively annexed to Piedmont, in exchange for a portion of Savoy, which was ceded to France.

CHAPTER V.

SIXTUS V. AND THE EMPIRE.

THE Emperor's embassy to congratulate the Pope arrived in Rome in the summer of 1586, and was composed of Count Daun of Zimbern, Dr. Curtius, and a numerous suite. Difficulties arising out of questions of etiquette, and the customary slowness of the Imperial chanceries, had occasioned the delay in departure from Prague. Once on their way, however, they accelerated their journey as much as the indifferent postal service at that time, the deplorable state of the roads, and the extreme stoutness of the principal ambassador, would allow. In Florence, the embassy met with the most flattering welcome. At the request of Rodolph II., Francis hastened to give Curtius the model of a machine which he used to cut diamonds.

Daun and Curtius had, besides the complimentary portion of their mission, to treat with the Holy See about a matter to which the Emperor attached great importance. It referred to the Vale of Tar,¹ which was held by Count Claudio Landi in fief of the Empire, and which the Duke of Parma, father of General Alexander Farnese, had confiscated, on the ground that he was Duke of Parma and of Piacenza.

High political considerations complicated the matter, which was not already very clear as a question of right. Prince Alexander Farnese, who was to succeed his father that year, was then at the zenith of his glory. In Rome, as in Madrid, there were a hundred reasons for humouring him. He was the general both of Philip and of the Church. From his camp before Neuss, which he was about to take from the Protestants, he had written to the Pope to recommend this siege to his prayers. Both the Pope and the King of Spain inclined in his favour. Besides which, it was only a matter of secondary importance ; but it gave rise to anxiety, for at all times Italian questions have easily brought about European complications.

Rodolph II., who was not easily moved, but who, once roused, was still less easily appeased, often perplexed his ministers by his tenacity whenever an idea had taken possession of his mind. In the usurpation of a fief belonging to the Empire, he saw an outrage to his authority as well as to his person, and, counting on the intervention of Sixtus V., instructed his ambassadors not to appear before him unless they could bring him a favourable reply. Daun and Curtius, therefore, set out on their journey, and were well received ; but the Holy Father's embarrassment was plain.

Situated, as he was, between his sincere deference for the head of the House of Austria, and that which he owed to Philip II. and his great General, Alexander Farnese, he vainly sought a solution in the law, and long hesitated before he took a decision. When, however, the ambassadors insisted on his deciding, he gave them a farewell audience.

He said he could not admit that the Church had any rights over the Vale of Tar, and that, if it had (of which he was not aware), he ceded those rights to the Emperor. His Majesty was undoubtedly obliged to protect the interests of Count Landi, his subject, just as the Holy See could not prevent the Duke of Parma, its vassal, putting forth his claim. The King of Spain offered to have the territory neutralised until the question of legality were decided. This proposition, added the Pope, which was dictated by the desire of His Catholic Majesty to preserve peace in Italy, met with his entire approbation. He ended by a peroration in honour of the Emperor, imploring him to associate his own views in the matter with those of his near relative the King of Spain.

The envoys replied with dignity, and retired without endeavouring to disguise their anger. To calm them, Sixtus sent Cardinal Azzolino to them. The Pope, he told them, knew that the young Duke of Saxony and the Margrave of Brandenburg were endeavouring to ensure to the King of Denmark the succession to the Empire. He was sure that he could thwart this plan. To this piece of news, which was intended to console them, the ambassadors replied by a burst of laughter; and Curtius exclaimed that these were German matters, which concerned the Emperor; that the Emperor would see to them ; and that the Pope knew what to do if he wished to be agreeable to His Majesty.

Baron Khevenhüller had no better success in Madrid, and Cardinal Granvella's losing his voice put a stop for a time to the conferences between the Courts of Prague and Madrid.

Other events, of more importance, called for the attention of the Imperial Government. Neuss, a town situated opposite Cologne, had fallen into the hands of Truchsess, formerly Archbishop of Cologne, who had embraced the doctrines of Calvin. That town was considered to be the key to Flanders. It was, therefore, of the highest importance that it should be rescued from those who had taken possession of it, and who maintained themselves in it, notwithstanding the efforts of the new Archbishop of Cologne, Ernest, and his brother William of Bavaria. Both these princes had applied to Rome for money aid. Sixtus replied by amiable words, and compared the House of Bavaria, which was faithful to Catholicism, though surrounded by heretics, to a rose blooming among thorns ; promised his diplomatic intervention with Rodolph, through Monsignor Sega, his former Nuncio at Madrid ; but was silent on the subject of money. To anyone who was acquainted with the state of feeling in Germany, with the susceptibilities and fears of the Protestant princes, and therefore with the troubles of Rodolph II., nothing could appear more inappropriate and dangerous at that moment than the appearance of a great Roman personage. Supported, in the name of the Emperor, by Cardinal Madruccio, the two dukes of Bavaria made strong, but vain, representations.

‘The Archbishop of Cologne,’ said the Pope to Gritti,¹ ‘asks us for money. We refuse it because he has five bishoprics, but has not yet taken orders, and has not even asked us for the “pallium.” How can we hope that matters will prosper if he behaves in this wise? He must be contented with his archbishopric, give up the other bishoprics, become a priest, and live as a prelate; then God and man will help him.’ Finally, he sent a nuncio, but sent no money.

With his usual clearsightedness he had understood that, like all German affairs, this question of Neuss would be delayed until it positively injured the Catholic cause. He appreciated also the strategical importance of that fortress. As long as it remained in the hands of the Calvinists, considering the state of things in France, the Spanish army of Prince Alexander was threatened in flank. This consideration was evident. It was not difficult to make it prevail at Madrid and at Brussels, and for the Pope it was the means of hastening the end without his spending a scudo. Farnese, with the King’s authority, made a rapid advance upon Neuss, appeared suddenly under its walls, was congratulated in his own camp by Monsignor Grimani, whom Sixtus V. had sent expressly, and took possession of the town and fortress after a siege which lasted only a few days.

In Prague the news was hailed, with a delight not altogether unalloyed. As a Catholic, Rodolph II. was pleased that the enemies of religion should have been defeated. As Emperor he regretted it. A passive and powerless witness of the Spaniards' victory on German soil in the name of religion, he could but reflect sadly over his weakness, which was the result of circumstances, no less than of his want of initiative; over the deep and unhappily irreparable disasters which the Reformation had caused in the heart of the Empire; over the paling prestige of his crown, the greatest though it were in Christendom. He had lost a true friend, one of the most eminent men of his time, a prince who was generally looked upon as the arbiter of Germany, Duke Augustus of Saxony, who was devoted to the House of Austria, a clever and enlightened personage as well as a lover of peace. Though a Lutheran, he had, by the mere prestige of his authority, kept the Margrave of Brandenburg from giving his adherence to Archbishop Truchsess of Cologne, and had thus rendered a great service to the Emperor. At Rodolph's Court, it was asked how the young Duke who succeeded was disposed towards the Empire. His intentions were not known; all that was known was that, contrary to his father's wishes, he inclined to the Calvinists, and listened to the advice of his uncle, the King of Denmark. There was, therefore, the more cause for alarm, since the evident connexion between the events in France and those that were preparing in Germany could not be denied. Even the most superficial observers felt how important was the question at issue. Those who, by their position, could see behind the scenes, were justified in asking themselves whether all was not lost.¹

At the outset of the reign of Sixtus V., the Protestant princes, with Duke Augustus of Saxony at their head, had expressed a fear lest the Pope should act towards them as he had already done towards the King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé. To calm his powerful friend, and, through him, the other princes who had embraced the new religious doctrines, the Emperor had tried to dissuade the Holy Father from adopting a similar measure. The latter had at once reassured Rodolph, without, however, taking any engagement as to the future. His bull therefore did not please altogether, and the Emperor instructed the brothers Madruccio to ask that the conditional promise for the future might be changed into a promise for the future without any condition attached to it.² They were met by a refusal. 'At present,' said Sixtus, 'we do not intend to make a declaration against the Protestant Electors; but Germany wants a good reform.' Such was the ascendancy which Protestant princes still believed the Pope to possess, that they trembled at the idea that he could send forth a bull depriving them of their sovereign rights, and liberating their subjects from their allegiance to them.

The French Huguenots profited by the not very explicit language of the Pontiff to influence the

² The bull said 'non incommodaremus,' while the Emperor asked that the words should be changed into 'non incommodabimus.'

Lutheran princes, who wanted peace, and were more or less devoted to the Emperor. To shake their allegiance they declared that the cause of Calvinism was that of the Reformation ; that if the Pope succeeded in France, he would at once turn against Germany ; that he would then publish the bull against the Protestant princes which so alarmed them ; that time was pressing ; that they should coalesce ; that the cause of the Reformation and their political power were at stake. The Calvinistic princes put forward even the prospect of conquering France with the help of the German confederates, of Queen Elizabeth, and of the Netherlands Protestants, reserving until after the victory the question of dividing the spoils. A quantity of pamphlets were published, directed against the Emperor, and said to be printed in France. Satire opened the war, until actual war implements were put into requisition. The Emperor did not keep back from the Nuncio how powerless he was. He confessed to him that he was wholly unable to prevent the Calvinist princes sending aid to the Huguenots in small detachments, and again insisted that the Pope should declare categorically that he would remain neutral as regards German affairs in the future, as he was then and had been in the past. Sixtus replied by a 'non possumus,' and maintained the conditional promise for the future contained in his famous bull.

Relations with Rome cooled little by little. Count Daun's unsuccessful mission had turned the Emperor against the Pope. The attitude and language of the Nuncio wounded him. Though grown old in the management of affairs, Monsignor Sega was often wanting in tact and discretion. He loudly blamed the policy followed by the Prague Cabinet, maintained that Rodolph allowed the Protestants to arrogate privileges to which they had no right in the time of Maximilian II., and asked to be informed of the instructions given to an agent sent by the Emperor to Saxony and Brandenburg. The Vice-Chancellor complained of the Nuncio's curiosity, hastiness, and delay in returning his visit. Other causes of disagreement were rife between them, so that Monsignor Sega henceforth only communicated with him through a third person.

Sixtus regretted what he called the decay of the German branch of Hapsburg, as well as his inability to do anything for the head of the Empire. 'Rodolph,' he said, 'has not shoulders broad enough to support the weight of the plans we conceive.'¹

The Chevalier Urbani, the ambassador of the Grand-Duke of Tuscany, has given the following picture of the Imperial Court at that time. 'Never,' says he,² 'was union between the head of the house and its members more necessary. Harmony, however, is far from existing, since the archdukes are fighting among themselves as to who shall be King of the Romans. Each one offers himself as a candidate. The Emperor hesitates. His predilection is for Ernest; but Ferdinand intrigues, and Archduke Charles of Styria³ is the most popular candidate with the Protestant princes. He brought home no

favourable impression of his sojourn in Spain. He is tolerant, and reminds one in this respect of Maximilian II., who knew so well how to maintain both Protestants and Catholics in his allegiance. The wife of Charles, the Archduchess Mary, revives the ambition of her husband, and declares that he and his brother the Duke of Bavaria are alone capable of some day wearing the Imperial crown. She is so convinced of his future greatness, that she speaks of it often and always thinks of it.' The other princes had less chance. Ernest was looked upon as too intimate with the Court of Spain, Maximilian too Catholic, and Ferdinand as a madcap. Would that election of a successor take place? When? No one knew, for the Emperor was silent. Rodolph, who was still anxiously bent on his marriage with the Infanta of Spain, though at times he thought of asking her for Ernest, continued his secret negotiations with the Catholic King in that view. The letters of the King of Spain on the subject were not shown to any of the ministers. He opened them himself, and replied through his private secretary. But the great question was that of the election of the King of the Romans. 'If the Protestants,' says Urbani, 'turn their eyes, as it is believed, towards the King of Denmark, no one thinks that they can seriously hope that the choice will fall upon a heretic, seeing how hostile the Catholics would be to such an issue, and how divided their camp is by different sects. What they want is the Empire to be maintained in the hands of a Catholic, provided it be a weak prince, so that the Empire may die away little by little, as people die of fever, while they themselves have time to gain daily in strength, in power, and in authority.'

This deplorable statement of the case was but too true. Rodolph thought of nothing but of his projected marriage and of the election of the King of Rome. These two ideas haunted him, and poisoned his life. The interests of his family required him to provide for the succession to the Empire; but the hope, which he had not given up, of having children if he married, made the thought of having a successor in the person of one of his brothers odious to him. He therefore adjourned the election which was pressing, and urged his marriage with the Infanta, which was but a fancy. In this groove of ideas was the mind of that unfortunate prince imprisoned. Out of it he seldom issued. Hunting and shooting were his favourite pastimes. He used to give himself up to them for weeks; but whenever he returned from his country house at Brandeis, he fell back into his perplexity, running for ever after a phantom, and shutting his eyes to the requirements of reality.

Around him the archdukes stirred themselves, and in their wake followed their confidants and the councillors of the Empire, all divided among each other, and each favouring one or other of the candidates to the throne. Enmities and rivalries among the ministers and great personages of the realm had created a host of coteries, in which those who had any business to transact were lost. The good graces of the Vice-Chancellor were to be won. This could only be done on the condition of displeasing old Trauzen and

Rumpff, and the latter could not be satisfied without awakening the suspicion of the influential Curtius. The Bohemian lords, who were jealous of their country's prerogatives, were often openly at feud with the dignitaries of the Empire. Baron Rosenberg was at variance with the majordomo, and it needed a long negotiation before they were reconciled even in appearance. Difficulties arising out of etiquette often prevented matters from taking their regular course. Thus the Emperor had been obliged to interfere before Curtius could be made to accept, on the occasion of the embassy to Rome, a position inferior to that of Count Daun.¹

The deplorable state of the finances, if one may talk of the finances of a Government of which the treasury is always empty, and which has no means of filling it, added to the existing evil. Frequently messengers could not be sent because there was not ready money enough to pay their expenses, and the offer of the banking house of Fugger at Augsburg to send the imperial correspondence to Madrid and to Paris by its own messengers was gratefully accepted. The Grand-Duke of Tuscany used similar means to keep well with the Emperor and his ministers.²

Rodolph was not wanting, however, in sterling qualities—at that period of his life, at all events, when his mind had not yet been assailed by the malady which was soon to visit him. He had a deep and quick sense of his position and of the duties incumbent upon him.

² The murder of Henry III. was known at Prague only through the German papers. The King was killed on August 1: it was only known positively on the 31st, by a letter from Venice. Lenzoni, 1589.

His mind was clear and apt to work ; but he judged of things imperfectly, mixed up matters of great and small moment, and attached too much importance to detail. His passive energy and his power of resisting would have been virtues had they not so frequently degenerated into obstinacy. His characteristic slowness and want of resolution made him incapable of acting when action was necessary, and only served his purpose when abstention was requisite. Abstention was the policy of the Imperial Court in the midst of circumstances which threatened even the existence of the Empire, which allowed the enemy to dare as much as he could hope, and he could hope everything, and which condemned the friend to become a mere spectator.

We may readily conceive the impatience, the anger, the distress of Sixtus V., who felt the necessity of a 'good reform,' according to his own idea of reform, but who felt also that he could not depend upon the aid of the sovereign most interested in affording him help and support. Hence the expressions of contempt which he often broke out into when speaking of Rodolph. It may seem strange, but it often happens in history, that a man is constrained to admire his adversary and to deplore the weakness or thoughtlessness of his friend. Courage, ability, energy, success, all belonged to Henry of Navarre or Elizabeth of England ; but the reverse was to be found in the allied camp—namely in Rodolph, whom we have described, at Prague ; in Philip II., at Madrid, who possessed great qualities undoubtedly, but the effects of which were paralysed by procrastination, by excessive prudence, by too strong a desire to grasp everything, to do everything himself, by age, infirmity, and an adverse fortune, which, though it had not yet broken his iron will, had led his judgment astray, and increased that fatal illusion in sovereigns which consists in their believing that they should not grant their confidence to anyone, just as if political credit were not, like commercial credit, an indispensable element of success. Sixtus sighed : he should have had the Emperor Ferdinand II., who was then barely eight years old, but who was destined to undertake in Germany that reform which the Pope was meditating—that reform which he himself was wont to say was a dream, which was in truth a mere dream during his lifetime, but which was to be partly realised in the succeeding century, long after his death.

CHAPTER VI.

SIXTUS V. AND THE KINGDOM OF POLAND.

FROM the time of his accession Sixtus had shown particular interest in the affairs of Poland. King Stephen Bathori was a man according to his own heart, and Father Possevin, of the order of the Jesuits, who was the agent of both sovereigns, was the confidant of each. To make of Poland, under Bathori, a rampart against the Turk, to open a field in the direction of Russia to the ambition of that prince, to annihilate the infidels, bring back the schismatics to their allegiance to the Church—such were the bold projects¹ which had sprung up in the ardent mind of the Pope as well as in the adventurous spirit of the King. No one was dearer to Sixtus V. than the chivalrous and courageous King of Poland. When, at the beginning of 1587, the Holy Father received the tidings of his death, the news deeply affected him both as a man and as a politician. He gave way to his sorrow in a funeral oration, which he delivered before the Consistory. ‘Great,’ said he, ‘is the grief which fills our heart since we have heard of the death of a magnanimous prince, equally Catholic and powerful. He was magnanimous, for he always aimed at great objects, and only a short time since he entertained great and noble projects. He was powerful, for he never shrunk from danger, nor allowed himself to be conquered by adversity. He was Catholic, for he had declared at the Diet, with his sword turned against himself, that rather than see the faith abandoned he would prefer to die, and that he was resolved to defend religion with all his might, and with the co-operation of his States, and, if these failed, with his sword alone. Such a prince have we lost, and with him our best hopes; for with the money we had sent him he was preparing to fight the Turks, to invade Russia, and thus to effect a junction with the Tartars and the Persians.'

The Pope was delicately situated. He had but one object—to preserve intact the jeopardised interests of the Church in Poland. The two pretenders to the throne of Bathori, Archduke Maximilian and Sigismund of Sweden, both protested their devotion to the Church, while they asked the Pope for his support. The Prince of Sweden even gave out hopes of the return of Sweden to the Catholic faith. But, though the sympathies of the Pope went with the latter, Sixtus remained neutral. He took up an expectant position, and at least had the advantage of being able to refuse the subsidies which the Court of Prague asked of him with much persistence. He complained of it in conversation, with all that freedom and fluency of words which marked his private intercourse with people. 'He told me,' wrote Cardinal de Joyeuse to Henry III.,¹ 'a deal on that subject, as he willingly speaks on every occasion. Among other things he said, in allusion to the defeat and imprisonment of Archduke Maximilian, that the sins of the House of Austria were the cause of what had occurred; that the Emperor was a sovereign who possessed not one good quality, and was a very lukewarm Catholic; that his father had been a very bad prince, who had no religion at all; that in his Polish expedition he had shown neither justice nor foresight; that one election having taken place, another should not have been intrigued for; but that, having caused it to be renewed, sufficient courage and discretion should have been shown to maintain that election and make it prevail; that he had been asked for money, but had declined because he knew there was as much chance of its being ill spent as of its being ill returned, besides which the Prince of Sweden would have been offended, and therefore less partial to the Catholic cause. Now he hoped that the latter prince would help, not only against the heretics, but also in bringing back Sweden to Catholicism after the death of his father.' Cardinal Madruccio, who had been instructed to obtain monetary aid, could obtain nothing; and, while the diplomatic parleys were prolonged, events took a rapid course. The Diet at Cracow was divided between two competitors. Hostilities having broken out, Maximilian, after some partial success, was defeated before Cracow, and made a prisoner. Sigismund, who thus became King de facto, at once entered into relations with Rome, wrote to the Pope a letter expressive of his submission, and, for the reason we have given, as well as through success, that most powerful of arguments, he managed to gain the Pope's favour.

Matters stood thus when the Pope received letters from the dowager Empress, who had retired to Spain, from Philip II., and from the Grand-Duke of Tuscany. The Empress implored his intervention to obtain the release of her son. Philip, indignant at the outrage which a member of his family had received, announced his intention of having recourse to arms, not only to deliver the Archduke, but also to place him on the throne of Poland. The Grand-Duke, out of respect for the Emperor, pleaded warmly in favour of the captive prince. Sixtus V., who was moved by the grief of the mother, as well as obliged to defer to the wishes of the King of Spain, and who, though unmindful of what he said against them, was yet full of regard for the Imperial family, hastened to comply with the wishes expressed. In order not to wound the Emperor nor the King of Spain, he did not answer Sigismund's letter, but sent him a verbal message through the Nuncio at Cracow to satisfy him, and at the same time to accelerate the liberation of the Archduke.

The affairs of Poland were discussed in several Consistories. Cardinal de Joyeuse strenuously upheld the rights of Henry III., which he had not given up. The opinion of the other cardinals was divided as to whether the Holy See should or should not intervene. Sixtus adopted a middle course. He decided upon sending a legate to Cracow who should not be accredited at the Court of Sigismund, but who should have to treat with all the interested parties respecting the pacification of Poland.¹ This difficult mission was offered to Cardinal Farnese. He was then living in the country, surrounded by a few religious men, and spending his time in pious practices. Disgusted with the world, he thought of nothing but the salvation of his soul. He declined the honour, giving as an excuse his old age and the state of his health. The Pope then chose Cardinal Aldobrandini. To Farnese, who disappears from the stage of the world, Aldobrandini, who now appears on it, owes his greatness. For the second time the great Cardinal had exercised a decisive influence over his destiny. Ippolito Aldobrandini was the youngest son of many children. His father was a celebrated lawyer in Florence, who afterwards became auditor of Cardinal di Ravenna, and his lieutenant-governor when the latter was governor at Fano. Here Ippolito was born. His brothers were all successfully employed in the army, in the Church, and in the law. The future cardinal and future pope had been placed in a banking house in Rome. His father regretted it much, but, as there were no means of giving the child a classical education, Ippolito was condemned to earn his livelihood as a copyist. Aldobrandini was inconsolable, and having one day spoken to Cardinal Farnese of his grief, he obtained a pension for his son out of the revenues of the bishopric of Spoleto, which allowed him to follow the lectures on theology. The young man made rapid progress, became ‘auditore della rota,’ accompanied Cardinal Buoncompagni to Spain, and was made a cardinal by Sixtus V. Farnese had, by his liberality, pushed him into the line which was to lead him to a cardinalship. By refusing the embassy to Poland, he prepared the way for him to become Pope, for by this mission Aldobrandini acquired not only powerful and useful acquaintances, but also the reputation of a statesman, and a glory which dazzled the crowd while it did not offend his colleagues. They saw him too intimately to be mistaken as to his commonplace qualities. The turn of his mind, which was somewhat heavy, corresponded to his physique. He was stout and bilious, but robust, and as indefatigable at work as he was slow at it. He appeared as one not likely to live long.¹

Such was the man who was entrusted with this important mission, the ostensible purpose of which was to pacify the Sarmatian kingdom, while its real object was to maintain Catholicism in Poland and restore it in Sweden. Maximilian's liberation was also to be obtained, as an essential condition of the cessation of hostilities with the House of Austria. The vast designs of the enterprise in the north and in the east were abandoned since the death of Stephen Bathori. Instead of attacking, a defensive policy was resolved upon; and fortunate it would be if Poland could be maintained in its allegiance to the Holy See, and rendered sufficiently strong to oppose a barrier to the propagation of the schism and to the encroachments of the Crescent. This was what the Legate would have to do. A sufficient salary was granted to him; and the Grand-Duke of Tuscany, to be agreeable both to Rome and to the Emperor, increased it and paid it out of his own income.¹

¹ Belonging to the zealous party, he was in intimate relations with Philip Neri, and together with that Saint, and his friends Panfilii and Cusano, often deplored the scandal of nepotism. Philip Neri, who was always fighting against this evil of the Papacy, had one day caused these three cardinals to swear that whoever of the three should become Pope would put a stop to it for ever. Aldobrandini engaged himself so to do, and never ceased speaking against these abuses. A saying of his at dinner at the Archduke Ferdinand's at Innsprück, against Sixtus, was afterwards remembered. But alas! the conduct of Clement VIII. was not to harmonize with the promises of the Cardinal Aldobrandini. Few of his predecessors showed themselves so subservient to the wishes of his family. 'We are all so made,' exclaimed his friend Panfilii; 'as long as we are at the bottom of the tree we form the best resolutions, but we are no longer the same men when we reach the top of the ladder.' Few Popes of that comparatively recent period have survived in the memory of the Roman people: Aldobrandini has, owing rather to the death of Beatrice Cenci than to the acts of his Pontificate.

Aldobrandini at once set out on his journey;² went to Vienna, and thence to Poland, without calling at Prague, where the Emperor had expressed no wish to see him.

The young Duke of Saxony, who was less deferential to the wishes of Rodolph than his father had been, recognised Sigismund as King of Poland, in concert with the Margrave of Brandenburg. This was a bad augury for the success of the Legate's mission. The Abbé Resca, whose mission to Rome had been delayed out of respect for Philip II., arrived at last³ as the King of Poland's internuncio, and had a private audience with the Pope. He tried to justify Maximilian's captivity by the refusal of the archdukes to treat with his master, or to recognise his election, or to clear the territory and places still held by their troops. In consequence, however, of the opposition made to it by Cardinal Madruccio, and of the unfavourable news received from the Legate, the solemn reception of the internuncio was adjourned, and Aldobrandini received instructions to return unless he could hope for an early success.

He had met with serious difficulties at Cracow. Sigismund gave him a magnificent welcome, but declared that he could do nothing without the consent of the Senate. The Senate decreed the prolongation of Maximilian's captivity, because he refused to give up his pretensions. To conquer these difficulties Aldobrandini went to Prague, and, after a long delay, it was agreed that a mixed commission, presided over by the Cardinal, and composed of ten Austrian persons of distinction, of whom Rosenberg was one, and as many Poles, should meet on the frontier of Silesia and of Poland. Hostilities were to be suspended while the conference lasted. It began in September, but lagged considerably. Rodolph was so displeased with the delay that he withdrew the powers of his delegates, but subsequently he restored them. Other incidents complicated the frequently stormy transactions, which ended by peace¹ being signed between the House of Austria, the King of Poland, and the Queen-dowager, the widow of Stephen Bathori.

time when the Pope was going down the stairs to the Sala Ducale, there to hold a Consistory. Having dismissed everybody present except the cardinals, and the ambassadors of Savoy and of Venice, who were there accidentally, he said one ought to rejoice over good news on Good-Friday, although a day of grief, since it was also a day of peace, as the death of Christ represented peace and reconciliation between the world and the Eternal Father. On this account he had no hesitation in communicating to them the news he had that moment received, of the peace which had been concluded with Poland; and read to them the Legate's despatches, as well as the text of the treaty. Here are the principal clauses of that document, the prolixity of which so shocked the Venetian ambassador.

The contracting parties recognised the Pope as mediator, and declared peace made between the House of Austria, the King of Poland, and the Queen of the House of the Jagellons.

In the particular clauses it was agreed: that Maximilian should give up his rights to the title of King of Poland from deference to the wishes of the Pope; that he should be set at liberty, and that the territories in Poland still in the hands of the invading armies should be evacuated by the Austrians. Another article, and the most important in the eyes of Sixtus V., obliged the Emperor to make no stipulation in his future truces with the Turks that might be prejudicial to Poland. On the other hand, King Sigismund entered into a similar engagement. This conception was a pre-eminently political one; for, with respect to the Turks, it created a kind of alliance between the two neighbouring Powers against them.

This very clause was displeasing at Prague, because it interfered with the liberty of action of the Emperor in the event of Sigismund going to war with the Russians. Rodolph maintained that he could not tie himself and eventually abandon the Russians, with whom he was in good relationship; and it was with great difficulty that his consent was obtained. Cardinal Aldobrandini, when passing through Vienna, said to the Archduke Ernest, 'Is the Emperor prepared to go to war with King Sigismund? for, if he is not, is he not afraid of losing what little remains to him of Hungary and the whole of Silesia?' The argument was felt to be a powerful one, and Rodolph declared himself ready to accept peace. One last difficulty remained to be settled. The treaty had to be sworn; that is, to be ratified, as we would now call it. On such occasions the emperors did not swear upon the Bible, but only gave their royal word (in verbo Cæsaris). After much wrangling Rodolph gave way on this point also; not, however, without deploring his weak state which obliged him to submit to such an humiliation.

An embassy from King Sigismund, which was composed of Cardinal Radziwill and of the Palatine of Cracow, left for Prague. The Emperor received them, seated under a canopy, which had been raised, not in the large apartments, but in his closet. The Nuncio, Dr. Curtius, Rumpff, Baron Rosenberg, and the majordomo of Bohemia were alone admitted as witnesses of this act, which was very repugnant to Rodolph. He got up to kneel before a crucifix which was near his chair, and, putting his hand on the Bible, he took the oath. The speeches spoken by the Polish cardinal and Dr. Curtius, in the name of their respective sovereigns, had been settled beforehand; but the Cardinal allowed himself to make a few impromptu remarks, to which the German doctor quickly retorted. Both sides began to be suspicious the one of the other, and the prompt release of Maximilian was questioned. In Madrid the treaty had given much dissatisfaction, and, to show his sovereign's disapprobation, the Spanish ambassador refused to be present at the taking of the oath, and had even that day left Prague.

It had been settled that the Archduke, accompanied by the Palatine and an escort of six thousand mounted cavalry, should be taken to the extreme frontier of Poland, and should only cross it after swearing that he would observe the treaty. But Maximilian, finding himself, on his arrival at the Silesian frontier, surrounded by a superior force of Austrian cavalry to that which had escorted him, refused to take the oath, and passed on. He soon learned that the Pope and the Emperor disapproved his conduct, which, if it had no other result, hindered the accomplishment of the plan which Sixtus V. had formed of marrying King Sigismund to an Austrian arch-duchess, always in the interest of religion.

Cardinal Aldobrandini, upon whom every honour was showered, made a splendid entry into Rome, and was received by the Pope in the new Palace of Laterano, which was scarcely finished, and has never since been used for a similar ceremony.¹

For Sixtus V. the re-establishment of peace between the Houses of Austria and Poland was a great and good diplomatic result. He had done good service to the latter by consolidating its incipient power, and to the former by restoring to it one of its members. At this moment he resumed his old plans, which we might have thought were buried with the chivalrous Bathori, but which presented themselves again to his mind. Their execution no longer appeared impossible to him if the young Sigismund could realise the hopes he had conceived, and, with the help of the Hapsburgs—who, though temporarily paralysed, were always formidable—succeed in making his kingdom the great barrier against which, as the Pope hoped, the power of the Mussulmans and the schism of the North would break. Events partially proved that conception to be just. Eighty-four years after the solemn reception at the Lateran of the Apostolic Legate who had signed the act of perpetual alliance, by which Austria and Poland were to unite in a common defence against the Crescent, King Sobieski relieved Vienna, which was on the eve of surrendering, notwithstanding the heroic defence of Roger Stahremberg, and this preserved Central Europe from the horrors of an invasion of the Turks.

¹ Gritti to the Doge, September 1586 to March 11, 1589. A. Badoer to the Doge, April 15, 1589, to May 15, 1590. Doge to Gritti, 1586. Olivares to Philip II. Card. de Joyeuse to Henry III., March 7, 1588. Pisany to Henry III., 1588. Henry III. to Card. de Joyeuse, 1588. Sixtus V. to Ferdinand of Tuscany. Alberti Lenzoni to the Grand-Duke.

To re-establish the unity of faith in the Christian world, and to do so, if possible, without injuring the European equilibrium, and to support his intervention by the excellent state of his finances—such were the fundamental notions of the policy of Sixtus the Fifth. The reader has seen how he worked in Italy, in Spain, in England, in Germany, and in Poland. He will now see how he pursued the same ideas with regard to France, which was, during his pontificate, the principal theatre of the great struggle between the Church and the Reformation.
